Mr. FALL. The suggestion which I am making now is that the proposition of using the forces only upon the western front in France in the prosecution of the war against Bulgaria is almost as ridiculous as the proposition which the Senator has suggested.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It may be ridiculous to our minds, and we may not agree with the policy, but my query is, Can we constitutionally remedy blunders in the movements of troops?

Mr. FALL. I think so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Except by expostulating——

Mr. FALL. I unhesitatingly think so. I want to go further. I agree with Sumner that when it becomes necessary to save this Union Congress has done and will do again just as the Executive has repeatedly done and possibly will do again—ultraconstitutional things—if it is necessary to do it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, I was not entering into that domain of thought. It may be——

Mr. FALL. But having entered into that domain of thought I naturally replied to the Senator's interrogatory.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course; but I hope neither Congress nor the President ever will violate the Constitution during the war. I wish to take this occasion to say that I entirely agree with the Senator that after having declared war, no matter in what desperate emergency we may come in the future, I have not the slightest idea the President will be any sort of a dictator in this country, even if he should desire it.

Mr. FALL. I think not. I have not the remotest fear of that. But even if he desired to be dictator and would succeed in carrying out his desires, and I am not accusing him of having any such desire—as a matter of fact I am not criticizing at all what the President has done so far, whether under the advice of military men or not. I think the United States now may be proud of what it is doing under the direction of the President of the United States in reinforcing the allies on the western front, or it may be proud of what he is doing in providing ships for such purposes; it may be exceedingly proud of what he is doing in raising men and armaments. The subject nevertheless does crop out as to how this war shall be best prosecuted with the additional number of men we are to raise, and I say that the Congress of the United States has a right to say in raising 500,000 additional men or 1,000,000 additional men that they shall be used in certain places for carrying on the war.

Congress may not be able to compel the carrying out of its suggestions or directions. The President of the United States may in his wisdom refuse to carry out the orders of Congress in the matter. If he does, he will undoubtedly do so because of military reasons satisfactory to him, and I have no doubt that upon his placing before Congress such reasons, if Congress had offended him by directing him to do anything, it would withdraw the direction.

But we are now called upon to provide additional men to carry on this war. We are discussing the matter of the Serbians and Bohemians and Slavs in southern Europe. The fact is that we are confronted with a condition which has existed ever since the declaration of war against Austria. Congress has done nothing to make good the promises of the President of the United States to Greece; it has done nothing to make good the promises we have constantly held out to Serbia; it is doing nothing and has done nothing except in the nature of the suggestion now being discussed as to how best to assist the Serbians, Bohemians, Slavs, and others in southern Europe.

Now, something practical should be done. The matter of discussion of what is practical is peculiarly within the function of the Congress of the United States. As I have said, in my judgment, in the matter of raising armies, the Congress of the United States can not only raise them, but may say it is for the prosecution of the war in the Balkans, that it is for the prosecution of the war in Siberia, that it is for the prosecution of the war in Mesopotamia or in Palestine; and to me as a layman the additional force should be provided and used upon the weak points in the German offensive and not be thrown into a slaughter pen beyond the number necessary to hurl back the advancing Germans in France. It must be apparent to anyone that only a certain number of men can be economically used for such a direct purpose. Now, what are we going to do with the others?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will yield to me, as very pertinent to the discussion a moment ago relative to the Japanese situation and the Japanese attitude toward our allies, I send to the desk an article clipped a day or two ago from the Washington Times entitled "Warns allies not to ignore Japan," by Mr. Arthur S. Draper. I ask unanimous consent that it may be read.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I did not hear the request of the Senator from South Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GUION in the chair). The Senator from South Dakota requests the reading of a clipping from the Washington Times.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Is it the request of the Senator to print it in the RECORD or to have it read?

Mr. STERLING. My request was to have it read at the desk, but I will waive that.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator has a right to do that in his own time, and I would not think of telling the Senator to read it. So I withdraw any objection I may have.

Mr. STERLING. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD as pertaining to the discussion just had relative to the Japanese situation.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will permit me, I think the article is so pregnant with information that it will prove of very great value to the Senate; I know it will to me. I should be delighted to have it read now.

Mr. STERLING. That was my first impression.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have no objection to the Secretary reading it if I can have it understood that it is my object to keep out of the RECORD—and I am going to do it if I can, with the aid of the Senate—any editorial or printed matter from any source on earth. The Senator in his own time can take the floor and read it, but I would not subject the Senator to that labor, and I will not object if he desires the Secretary to read it from the desk. It will then go in the RECORD. But I will not consent to the printing, if I can help it, of any editorial from any paper in the RECORD without its being read before the Senate.

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator from Arizona that this is not an editorial; it is a communication by Arthur S. Draper, giving his views of Russia, and is directly pertinent to and I should like to have it go in as a part of the discussion of the Japanese situation.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have no objection, if the Senator wants to have it read in his time; but I object to unanimous consent for the printing of editorials in the RECORD.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I say I have no objection to the Senator having it read in his time or in the time of the Senator from Michigan. The Senator understands my position in the matter.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I know the Senator from South Dakota——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I supposed that I had the floor and that I was yielding to the Senator from South Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair had recognized the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I think the Senator from Michigan is right. I think I asked the Senator from Michigan to yield to me in order to present this matter to be read.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to say a word before I yield. I know the Senator from South Dakota is acting in perfect good faith; I know the Senator from Utah is very anxious to have this article read rather than to have it printed, because it would take some time on the bill in which I am interested; but I recognize that later the Senator from South Dakota could take the floor and read it, whether anybody listened to it or not. Therefore I will yield for the purpose of having it read.

Mr. STERLING. I thank the Senator from Michigan for his courtesy. It is appropriate here and would not be so appropriate at any other time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

WARNS ALLIES NOT TO IGNORE JAPAN—NORDMAN, RUSSIAN, SAYS SHE SHOULD BE ASKED TO FIGHT WITH THEM—PROBLEM IS DELICATE.

[By Arthur S. Draper.]

LONDON, July 17.

Nicholas Nordman, formerly general secretary of the Russian restriction of enemy supplies committee and later head of the economy department of the Russian foreign office under Miliukov and Kerensky, authorizes the following statement of the general political situation in the east. Nordman has just arrived in England from Sweden, where he prepared the recent agreement between Sweden and the allies.

"The far eastern problem is very delicate in its solution and requires great tact, foresight, and brains of the highest caliber. The problem is not a simple one. On the one hand Japanese intervention in Russia without the allies might be considered dangerous, but on the other hand a refusal of the Japanese to help contains the seed of much trouble.

WHAT MIGHT HAPPEN.

"What would happen if Japan considered herself rebuffed by not being invited to help in Russia? Having great interests in the Far East, she might sooner or later consider herself compelled to enter Siberia uninvited.

"It is necessary to remember that Japan is not a republic, but an empire with a strong military party and a highly sensitive honor. The allies must not encourage Japan's imperialistic ambitions by making her believe that to follow liberal tendencies would not secure her as much prestige as the militarists feel she is capable of conquering by force of arms.

"Japan has never been accused of forsaking the allies. The Japanese high code of honor forbids such a thought, but in any case it is not desirable to create a situation in which the interests of Japan will be different from the interests of her allies.

MUST WELCOME IN LEAGUE.

"Japan feels especially strongly any attitude which, rightly or wrongly, she interprets as a differentiation between herself and the other allies. One of the first and obvious ways to retain Japanese sympathy is to somehow arrange so that her national army actually fights the Germans. We must show that we welcome her to one of the highest places in the league of nations. By every means in our power we must encourage Japan to follow other nations in the liberal, democratic path rather than to embrace frank imperialism.

"I conceive that the solution of the eastern problem would probably be to invite Japan to intervene in Russia with the allies on some definite basis. What compensation Japan might require I have no idea. She should be asked. In any case, it is essential that Japan agree not to simply remain in Siberia but advance to fight the Germans as far west as possible.

SHOULD ADVANCE TO URALS.

"She must undertake immediately an advance as far as the Urals, forming a base, say, at Irkutsk and then at Tehelyabinsk, while the western allies form similar bases at Archangel and Vologda. A northern railway connects Archangel with the Tehelyabinsk via Vologda and Viataka. The allied forces should gradually push forward along this railway until they meet, establishing a new eastern front, from which the allied activities can extend westward as the new army gathers strength.

"It seems to me that unless some such action is taken to prevent Germany laying hands on Russian raw materials, Germany will be able to hold out for years. Under such a plan the Germans would undoubtedly immediately occupy Petrograd and Moscow, but under the present circumstances this must be regarded as relatively unimportant.

SEES NO REASON FOR FEAR.

"From the Russian point of view I see no great reason to fear Japanese intervention if it is carried out in conjunction with the allies. From an economical point of view I believe that some foreign force is absolutely necessary to establish the conditions necessary for the productive activity of the Russian people.

"Russia is now in the position of a man standing on his head. Previously 180,000,000 Russians worked while 1,000,000 governed. Now 180,000,000 prefer governing and compelling the 1,000,000 bourgeoisie to work. Such a situation is bound to lead to disaster.

NOBODY WANTS TO WORK.

"The real trouble with Russia at present is that nobody wants to work. The Germans, who fully realize this, keep 30 divisions of troops in the Ukraine, whose chief duty is compelling the people to work. Germany cares nothing for Petrograd, Moscow, and northern Russia, for they are quite unproductive. She completely neglects them, knowing full well that starvation will keep them in her power, while she concentrates her attention on regions rich in food and raw material and which also lead to India.

"By their arrival at Rostoff, the Germans have completed one-third of the way to India. After dominating the Ukraine and Crimea, the Germans will push eastward and busy themselves in the Don and Kuban Cossack regions. Representatives of the Caucasus, which lies still farther on the way to India, are now in Berlin discussing an agreement with Germany."

EXHIBIT OF TRENCH WARFARE AT QUANTICO, VA.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, about an hour ago I received a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, which I send to the desk. I ask to have the letter read for the information of the Senate, and after it is read I shall have something to say on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, June 19, 1918.

MY DEAR SENATOR TILLMAN: To-morrow (Thursday) at Quantico the marines are going to have an exhibition of trench warfare, machine-gun practice, and other military exercises. I would be glad if you and all the members of the Naval Affairs Committee would go down. We will leave on the 9.30 train, arriving at Quantico at 10.40. We will come back on the Mayflower, leaving there at 4 o'clock and getting to the navy yard about 6.30.

Will you be good enough to extend this invitation to all the members of the committee and any other Senators you think would be interested?

Sincerely, yours, JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, under the broad authority suggested, I take the liberty of inviting any Senator who is interested enough to go down to Quantico to go. The Secretary of the Navy will bring us all back on the Mayflower. We will have a ride on the water, if nothing else.

I am very much interested in seeing a little something of this trench warfare and the machine guns we read so much about and hear so much about. That is my reason for having the letter read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN subsequently said:

There seems to be some confusion in the minds of Senators about the time the train will leave for Quantico to-morrow. I merely wish to state that the Secretary says we will leave on the 9.30 train, arriving at Quantico at 10.40. Therefore those who want to go will go to the Union Station and take the 9.30 train.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10854) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 4, 33, 75, and 101 to the bill (H. R. 10854) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, further insists upon its disagreement to the residue of the amendments of the Senate, asks a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PADGETT, Mr. TALBOTT, Mr. RIORDAN, Mr. BUTLER, and Mr. BROWNING managers at the conference on the part of the House.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS' RETIRED LIST.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 130) to create in the War Department and the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as the "Civil War volunteer officers' retired list," to authorize placing thereon with retired pay certain surviving officers who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the Civil War, and for other purposes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the bill before the Senate is one that is familiar to all Senators, I presume. It is known as the volunteer officers' retirement bill. A similar measure passed the Senate a few years ago, and then went to the House, where it failed to receive consideration on account of the lack of time before the close of the session. It has been reported several times from the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, and I have asked for a vote upon it, but two or three Senators have always been able to employ dilatory tactics sufficiently to defeat final action.

I do not blame any Senator for opposing the bill if he does not believe it ought to pass. I have felt, however, that inasmuch as it is thoroughly understood and has been considered so extensively that it was only fair that a vote should be granted.

I now propose, so far as it lies within my power, to hold the measure before the Senate until a vote is obtained, and if two or three Senators feel it is their duty to delay the business of the Senate and of the country in their efforts to thwart a clear desire of a majority to vote upon this bill, that responsibility must lie with them and not with me.

I first desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there are two reports on this bill.

When it was reported by the Military Affairs Committee, the chairman did not understand that a new report had been prepared, and so the clerk of the committee adopted the old report; that is, the report on the previous bill. I have caused to be prepared, however, another report, going into the matter more in detail than has ever been done before and more nearly brings it up to date. I ask Senators to obtain the last copy, the one of June 6, which gives the various statutes to which references are frequently made, the orders of President Lincoln, and other matters connected with the merits of the subject.

Mr. President, I recognize, as does every other Senator, I believe, that this is the time when economy should be practiced; I have thought that we have voted money sometimes that was not necessary, and if this were an ordinary matter I could consent that action upon it should be deferred; but this question has been postponed for 53 years. The proposed beneficiaries under it are now 53 years older than they were when the obligation was incurred and the practical pledges of the Government made. They are now 80 years of age on an average; they are dying at the rate of 1,200 a year, and but about 7,000 of them are now living. From the very nature of things this legislation can not be longer deferred without continued grave injustice, without irreparable injury, if my contention on their merits is correct. Therefore I am urging final action at this time.

The bill proposes no new policy, Mr. President. This policy, as I recall it, about 40 years after the Revolutionary War, was adopted by Congress, and the volunteer officers were retired not at one-half pay, as we propose here, but at full pay. We are now by our current legislation placing the National Guard, the National Army, and the Regular Army all on an equal footing, and in the future retirement will apply to all with equal impartiality. I feel sure that such a policy will be adopted.

I repeat that there are about 7,000 of these men now living, and according to the best statistics and information which I can obtain, now that the so-called Smoot general pension law has been enacted, this bill the first year will carry something between four and five million dollars—less than five million. That amount will decrease very rapidly during the next few years, until in six or eight years it will be practically wiped out and there will be no more expense incurred by reason of it.

Mr. President, notwithstanding the opinion of Senators who may talk without the record, but who have convictions or ideas upon the subject of economy, I submit that the volunteer officers of the United States, who enlisted and trained and commanded 95 per cent of the forces of the Civil War, were promised treatment exactly in all respects like that accorded the Regular Army officers. They have not been so treated. Congress has not treated even volunteer officers with impartiality. We have enacted laws retiring some four or five Civil War officers on full pay; they had never been in the Regular Army. Congress has enacted laws retiring men in the Regular Army at the age of 62 at a grade in advance of the highest rank they held in the Army, simply because they served a few days, it might have been, as volunteers in the Civil War. Service as a volunteer retired them one grade higher than their Regular Army service would have entitled them to receive. Certainly the Congress can afford to be as just to the men and officers of the Civil War who left the Army at the close of that conflict when they were no longer needed and went into the pursuits of civil life to repair the ruin of war as it is to officers who remained in the Army during the long years of peace. These volunteers should be treated as fairly and as justly as their comrades who stayed in the Regular Army when the war was over and had their futures provided for, unconnected with danger, because they saw little service on the field after the end of the war. Yet, I repeat, the Congress of the United States has been almost constantly rewarding these Regulars because of their service in the Civil War as volunteers.

But, Mr. President, these facts are known. I have presented them a number of times on the floor of the Senate, and I dislike very much to take the time of the Senate in discussing matters with which all are already familiar. I know the opposition to the bill; in my judgment it is without foundation in reason or justice, but, under the rules of the Senate, Senators can occupy the time, and they have already threatened so to occupy it to defeat the will of the majority. But I repeat that I propose, so far as I am able, to hold the measure before the Senate for a final vote, and if it remains here unduly long opposition Senators will be responsible for delaying the work of Congress and of the country.

I know, sir, as does every other Senator, that we have passed bills in this body which have received the indorsement of some of the Senators who will oppose this bill which had much less merit than this particular one has. I shall not criticize Senators for voting against it. I know Senators do not all agree with me any more than I agree with them. I have no right to criticize them, and I do not do so; but I do insist that, when the merits have been presented to the Senate, there shall be an opportunity to dispose of it by a final vote.

I shall be pleased at any time to answer any question that I may be able to answer going to the merits of the bill itself. I am ready to explain its every detail.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator from Michigan really feel and believe that after this bill has been debated for a reasonable time a vote will not be taken on it?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; I think we shall have a vote on the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I stood here the other day and called attention to the fact that there had been very few exceptions during my 27 years' service in the Senate when a vote had been denied on a measure; and I do not believe there is any disposition at this session to delay or to defeat any measure by refusing a vote. I hope the Senator from Michigan will make himself believe, in discussing this question, that we shall have a vote on the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have faith that we shall have a vote. I will say to the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire that I believe the majority sentiment of the Senate will prevail after the question has been thoroughly discussed.

Perhaps I ought to mention before I take my seat this fact: One of the principal arguments in opposition to the bill has been that it proposes to treat the officers differently from the way the so-called common soldier is treated by our Government. Of course, that is true in a measure, for that is the case in every nation in the world; that is true of all the provisions that are made for an army. It is one of the distinctions which maintain, necessarily; there must be officers and men, and the former receive higher compensation than the latter; but let me remind you, Mr. President, that since 1890 there has been no recognition of rank in the Army among the Civil War volunteers. When we placed them on the flat pension basis we took away from the officer a distinction dear to him, which is recognized by all other nations, and which we ourselves had theretofore recognized.

Furthermore, while I have supported bills for granting pensions to the rank and file, I have recognized that they have been given practically double the pension or the pay which they received while they were in the Army. It is the only retirement that we can grant them. They received $13 a month, while some of them are now receiving $40 a month. The officers who paid their expenses, who were responsible for the property of the Government, and of whom superior qualifications were required, and who were charged with great and important responsibilities, have only received a pension of the ordinary enlisted man, and we are now asking in this bill that they shall receive recognition as officers, and we are doing it with the approval of the enlisted men in the ranks. We are demanding that after 53 years of deferred hope these officers may at least have their rank recognized by the Government, and that they shall be paid not to exceed one-half of the pay of officers of their actual rank but in no case to exceed three-fourths the pay of an active captain in the Army. I believe that would be just.

I repeat, if Senators will look at the references to the statutes which we have quoted, and recall that the act of July 25, 1861, was enacted solely for the purpose of correcting something that was left out of the statute of July 22, if they recall that the act of August 3, 1861, was pending and under discussion when the act of July 22, 1861, was under discussion, they will understand that Congress at that time had in mind not simply equality as to pay and allowances, but equally in all respects, present and future, that they were to be treated then and thereafter as the men in the Regular Army. They have not been so treated. Therefore I have had no embarrassment, even in this time of extreme expense, in asking that justice, long-deferred justice, be approximately done. I believe the passage of this measure will be helpful to patriotism. The report before the Senate does not ask pay for service to their country for these old officers. Their duty was gloriously performed without thought of compensation, and they are patriots now, and more is the reason for this Congress to perform its duty. Our action will further demonstrate that the Government keeps faith with its defenders.

So, Mr. President, I have waited patiently, hoping for the time to come when a majority could express itself. Now, we have the opportunity to do so, and I hope Senators will not think I am overpersistent if I insist in holding this bill before the Senate and urging its friends to be present and not allow two or three Senators to succeed in delaying action until they think something of more pressing war importance shall come up to take this measure off the floor, and with the hope that finally Congress will again fail to act. These veterans, who are now 80 years old and who were our heroes in 1861, as much so as are the men who now are wearing our uniform on the foreign battle fields, this remnant of volunteer officers of the Civil War, should not again be defeated by a filibuster. No Senator can say with reason that this is a proposition to pay these men more than is their just due.

They are entitled to the enforcement of the contract that was made by their Government with them. It is their due; it should be our privilege. In their old age the great majority of them are now in the soldiers' homes, subjects of public charity, and the few remaining days of their lives should be made brighter by this expression of a Nation's gratitude. If Congress is ever to take action on this matter, it must be taken now. The ranks of these officers are being depleted rapidly. They will be with us only a very few years, most of them only a few months. We should not delay action longer.

But I repeat, Mr. President, I have submitted these facts before. Most of the Senators are as familiar with them as I am. If they will read the last report, they will secure all the information I can give; and I shall be content if Senators, after voicing their opposition by such arguments as they can command, will allow us without concerted delay to come to a vote upon the measure.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before the Senator ceases speaking I should like to ask him to what extent would the enactment of this bill diminish our ability to pay the salaries of about 70,000 officers who are now performing the duties of file clerks in our several departments?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Well, it would be absolutely insignificant; it would scarcely be counted in the balance. I am glad the Senator has called attention to that fact, because it emphasizes what

I said a moment ago, viz, that we are spending the money of the Government now for all kinds of schemes that are advocated and for salaries for men who live in comfort and have many votes. The men affected by this bill are few in number, and their influence politically is practically gone. They are old men, nearing the end of life; yet their rights ought to be as sacred as the rights of those of the moderns who are drawing big salaries and who are perhaps more potential politically. I refer now, of course, to that army of captains, majors, colonels, and generals who some day will be pensioned for work performed not upon the battle fields but in comfortable offices here in Washington and other war-preparative centers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this bill is so important that it seems to me it ought to be discussed when there is a fuller attendance of Senators than is at present found in the Chamber. The justice of the claims of the individuals to whom the Senator from Michigan has referred, according to his view, seems to be so strong that I feel that other Senators ought to be here in order to listen to the advocacy of the justice of their claims.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did it occur to the Senator when the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] was making his splendid speech that there might well have been more Senators present?

Mr. KING. Yes; I thought of that; but I thought perhaps the Senator from Michigan was satisfied with his auditors, and was so satisfied that his bill would pass that I disliked to disturb him. When, however, I remember, Mr. President, that some of my own relatives who took part in the Civil War as volunteers, some of whom obtained commissions, when the war was over went back to private life, and have spent their lives in active work incident to citizenship and not in the Army, and when I realize that this bill now seeks to give them a gratuity, to give them a claim upon the Government, to place them on the same list as men who have given all their lives to the service of the country, who have not gone back to their various vocations, but have been compelled to give, by reason of their stay in the military service, all of their time and all of their talent to the Government—when I realize that it proposes to give men who have not served the Government for 40 years, but have been serving themselves, the same rank, the same pay, the same emoluments, and the same pensions as the former class, I confess that to appreciate the justice of that contention requires a mind built along different lines than my own; and I am so eager to have other Senators listen to the persuasive arguments of the Senator from Michigan and of those who entertain that strange view, that I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	Lewis	Sheppard
Bankhead	Harding	Lodge	Sherman
Borah	Hardwick	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Hitchcock	McKellar	Smith, Ga.
Chamberlain	Hollis	McNary	Smoot
Colt	Johnson, Cal.	Nelson	Sterling
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Sutherland
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Thompson
Dillingham	Kellogg	Page	Tillman
Fall	Kendrick	Poindexter	Townsend
Fernald	Kenyon	Ransdell	Vardaman
Gallinger	King	Robinson	Wadsworth
Gerry	Kirby	Saulsbury	Watson
Gronna	Lenroot	Shafroth

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. KING. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. KING. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah that the Senate adjourn. [Putting the question:]

Mr. KING. I ask for a division.

On a division the motion was lost.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and is subject to amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have opposed this measure when it has been before the Senate on prior occasions. As I understand, it proposes to place upon the rolls for pay as retired officers those who served temporarily during the Civil War; I mean those who served during the Civil War and then were retired honorably from the service.

We have a system by which those who entered the Army and served forty-odd years receive two-thirds pay when they reach the age of 62 or 64. I believe the Navy has a retiring age of 62 and the Army 64. We have followed the policy with reference to men who have served in the Army, beginning usually at about 20 and lasting until they are 64, of retiring them on something like two-thirds pay; the exact figures I do not recall—possibly three-fourths. These officers to whom this bill applies served a short time—at most not more than four years, I believe—and the effect of this bill, as I understand, is practically to place them upon the footing of those who served forty-odd years. They left the Army after the war. They have had the opportunity, with the prestige that they won, of success in civil life. Very many of them have won distinguished success in civil life, and this bill, without regard to their financial condition, without regard to their having suffered any injury during the war, with the very short period of service, relatively, proposes to treat them now practically as those are treated who served something like 44 years. It is to give them—is it two-thirds or three-fourths of their salaries during the balance of their lives?

Mr. TOWNSEND. They get three-fourths pay, not to exceed half the pay of a captain.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Three-fourths pay, not to exceed half the pay of a captain. Then my statement would be entirely in error as to a general, because you limit the pay to three-fourths pay, not to exceed half the pay of a captain.

I do not intend to consume the time of the Senate upon this measure, and I do not intend in any way to seek to prevent a vote. I am opposed to it, and I only wish to reexpress at this time my opposition. I believe in the most liberal compensation to those who are injured in the service. Anyone injured in the service of the United States as a soldier should be made whole by his country as nearly as money can make him whole; but those who are mustered out sound, those who really do not suffer physical injury as a result of the service, should receive their financial compensation during the period that they are in the service. I have never agreed with the view of the Senator from Michigan that there was any kind of contract with these men or any obligation to these officers—splendid officers no doubt they were, splendid citizens no doubt they are—to put them on the retired roll with retired officers' pay. There has been some talk about that from time to time, but I have seen nothing that amounted in any way to a binding obligation on the part of the Government to give this bounty.

We have carried the pension pay roll over $200,000,000. We appropriated to-day over $200,000,000 for the pension rolls for the ensuing year, the largest bill of the kind in the history of the country, and that over 50 years after the war ceased. The further we get from the war, and the fewer there are to recognize, the higher the charge. I do not think we ought to have made any of these increases in pensions during the past week. I do not think the pension bills of the recent date ought to have passed. I do not think the pension bill ought to have passed yesterday. I was compelled to be away from the city with a committee, visiting some airplane-manufacturing plants, or I should have expressed, not lengthily but very positively, my opposition to the bill that passed yesterday.

This is simply a measure to place these officers on the roll as retired officers, carrying their pay up to something like $3,000 apiece. I have not studied the bill in detail since we had it up more than a year ago, and I may be inaccurate in my figures. I do not pretend to be accurate. At that time it was thought that the charge would be something like $10,000,000 a year. I do not know what it will be now.

It is an ungracious thing to object to pensions. It is an ungracious thing to object to these appropriations. It is not a pleasant thing to do. The Senate has a right, as far as this body is concerned, to do whatever it wants to do, and I will content myself with this very brief expression of my regret that the measure is about to pass and that we are to carry the pension roll for the next year upward by increased bounty to those receiving no injury. We will have to add, I suppose, $10,000,000 or something like that to the appropriations to meet the expenditure that will be incurred under this bill. About what does the Senator from Michigan now think it will be?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think, as I said before, that under the greatest estimate that has been made by the Interior Department and others, when we take out the pensions that have been granted, it can not exceed $5,000,000. It will be less than that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Of course, each year it will be less.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Very much.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Several years ago, when the bill was under consideration, the best estimates I saw then were that it would be between nine and ten million dollars, I think. I have not looked into it carefully as to the total since.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Georgia that the passage of the bill on June 10 of this year considerably reduces the amount of pensions that will be granted under this bill; I can not say how many million dollars.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, yes; because they have already been increased by that bill?

Mr. SMOOT. They have been increased by that bill, and this bill in some cases will not affect in the least the pension drawn by them under the existing law. In other words, if this bill passes there are a good many of the retired officers who will receive under existing law a pension as great as they would receive under this bill, and therefore they will not receive any increase of pension whatever.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In other words, the substantial increase in all pensions made within the past few weeks carries the amount they now receive in all cases much nearer to what they will receive under this bill, and in some cases up to as much as they will receive. That is what I understand the Senator to say.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is true.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know where all the money is coming from, but I suppose it will come, and with this very brief statement I shall take no more of the time of the Senate upon the subject.

Mr. KING addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. KING. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	McNary	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Hollis	Myers	Smoot
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Nelson	Sterling
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Sutherland
Curtis	Kellogg	Nugent	Townsend
Dillingham	Kendrick	Page	Trammell
Fall	King	Poindexter	Vardaman
Fernald	Kirby	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Gronna	Lenroot	Robinson	Watson
Guion	Lewis	Saulsbury	Willey
Hale	McCumber	Sheppard
Harding	McLean	Sherman

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-six Senators only have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. MYERS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when Mr. MCKELLAR's name was called). I was requested to announce that the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] is absent on official business.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] and vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I ask if the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. WARREN. I have a general pair with that Senator. I therefore withhold my vote. If privileged to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. NEW] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, my purpose in rising is to announce for the day, as well as for this particular vote, the absence of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], occasioned by his personal illness, and the absence of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], occasioned by illness in his family.

Mr. JONES of Washington (after having voted in the negative). The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent for the day and I have a pair with him. Therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. HARDING (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. HARDING. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Alabama. In his absence and my inability to secure a transfer I withdraw my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and ask leave to withdraw my vote, but ask to be counted as present to help make a quorum.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have a pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY. The senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] are necessarily absent.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]; and

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 32, as follows:

YEAS—10.

Beckham	Kirby	Saulsbury	Willey
Kendrick	Myers	Trammell
King	Robinson	Vardaman

NAYS—32.

Brandegee	Guion	McNary	Sherman
Colt	Hale	Nelson	Smoot
Cummins	Hollis	Norris	Sterling
Dillingham	Johnson, Cal.	Nugent	Sutherland
Fall	Lenroot	Page	Tillman
Fernald	Lewis	Poindexter	Townsend
Gallinger	Lodge	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Gronna	McLean	Sheppard	Watson

NOT VOTING—54.

Ashurst	Harding	Martin	Smith, Md.
Baird	Hardwick	New	Smith, Mich.
Bankhead	Henderson	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Hitchcock	Owen	Swanson
Calder	James	Penrose	Thomas
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Phelan	Thompson
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman	Underwood
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Pomerene	Walsh
Fletcher	Kellogg	Reed	Warren
France	Kenyon	Shafroth	Weeks
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Shields	Williams
Gerry	La Follette	Simmons	Wolcott
Goff	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.
Gore	McKellar	Smith, Ga.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The following Senators are present in the Chamber and not voting, being seven in number: The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], making a quorum present.

Mr. LEWIS. As a matter of parliamentary privilege, the Chair did not mean to announce, I fancy, that he recognized the Senators as present and counted them because they were here. The Chair meant to assume that they announced themselves as being present?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair stands corrected. The Chair should have observed that the Senators, with the exception of the Presiding Officer, announced that they were present. The Presiding Officer did not announce that he was present. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, this bill has been before Congress, either in one House or the other, for a great many years. Up to this time I have taken no attitude in opposition to the bill, because, while it is merely a gratuity, I did not see that it would create a precedent that might be followed in the future which would be very serious to the Treasury of the United States. It is largely because of the precedent that the passage of this bill would create and the action of the Congress in the future with reference to the officers of the present war if this bill is passed that I speak in opposition to the passage of the bill.

I said, Mr. President, that I regarded it as a gratuity if the bill was passed. I am aware that the report of the committee treats this matter as an obligation upon the part of the Government to the surviving officers of the Civil War. I think I shall be able to show that there never has been a pledge upon the part of the Government to retire these officers in the way that is now proposed or in any other way, but even if that were so, from the beginning to the end of the report of the committee they endeavor to argue that the alleged promise held out by Congress and Abraham Lincoln to these volunteer officers that they should be upon the same footing in all respects as officers in the Regular Army was an inducement to these men to offer their services. Mr. President, I believe that is an undeserved reflection upon the volunteer officers of the Civil War. I believe the officers of the Civil War were just as patriotic as are the officers of the war in which we are now engaged, and there is no pretense that there is any such inducement held out to the young men of to-day in entering the Army, and there is no dearth to-day of applications for commissions in this war. I can not for one moment believe that at the time of the Civil War the men who then so nobly responded to the call of their country did it because an inducement was held out to them that they should be put upon the retired list for life. It is a reflection upon them that is undeserved.

But, Mr. President, as we read the history of the Civil War, the motives that induced these officers to enter the service were not different from the history that is being made in this war, and the motives that induce the young men to enter the service now. The fact is, Mr. President, as to officers in the Civil War, as it is true of officers in this war, the securing of a commission is not looked upon as a sacrifice. It is not looked upon as rendering a greater service to the country than the sacrifice of an enlisted man. On the contrary, then, as now, a commission was looked upon as a reward to the man, as giving to him something better and of higher degree than the enlisted man received.

Indeed, the committee in its report recognizes it by stating, I think, more than once in the report that many of these officers were "promoted" from the ranks to an officer's commission. Of course they were, and as officers of the Civil War they received not only higher compensation than enlisted men, but they received the glory, they received the honor, which attended the position.

So it can not be said, it seems to me, that the officer either in the Civil War or in this war is entitled to any greater honor or to any greater consideration after the war is over than is the man in the ranks. Yet this bill would place the officers in that war upon a plane which would give them a compensation many times that which the enlisted man received during his life.

Reference has been made to the fact that the officer in the Regular Army who serves up to a certain age is retired and given retired pay, and the suggestion is made that these men who patriotically offered themselves ought to receive at least the same consideration as those officers in the Regular Army.

Mr. President, it does not seem that it should require any argument to show the distinction. In the case of the Regular Army military service, it is held out as a profession. It is not called forth as a matter of patriotism. It is a profession, and because the man gives up the opportunity for life to acquire a competence for himself and his family, if he has one, devotes his entire life to that profession at a very moderate compensation, retirement pay is given.

But in the case of the officer who served during the period of the war the situation is entirely different. It does not require any such inducement to get him into the service, for I hope we are not paying for patriotism in this country.

But, Mr. President, throughout this report it is argued that here was a pledge made by Congress and by Abraham Lincoln to these officers that they should receive this consideration. If it were true that there was such a pledge, whether or not the men were actuated by that in proffering their service, it would be a pledge that we ought to keep by the passage of this bill. However, I do not think that anyone can read even the report of the committee, which argues for the position that there was such a pledge, and come to the conclusion that there was any pledge or any promise of this character.

What is the legislation upon the subject? On July 22, 1861, the first act was passed, upon which the committee relies as the basis for this bill. That act provided:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates, organized as above set forth, shall in all respects be placed on the footing, as to pay and allowances, of similar corps of the Regular Army.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That any volunteer who may be received into the service of the United States under this act, and who may be wounded or otherwise disabled in the service, shall be entitled to the benefits which have been or may be conferred on persons disabled in the regular service. * * * (Approved July 22, 1861.)

That is the first legislation that is quoted by the committee. The next act quoted is an act passed by Congress three days later, on July 25, and substantially the only change, so far as it affects this question, is this:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the volunteers authorized by this act shall be armed as the President may direct; they shall be subject to the Rules and Articles of War, and shall be upon the footing in all respects with similar corps of the United States Army, and shall be mustered into the service for "during the war." (Approved July 25, 1861.)

This is what the committee relies upon as the pledge of Congress to these officers that they should be placed upon the same footing in all respects as those who served in the Regular Army. That is true; they were placed upon the same footing in all respects as those who served in the Regular Army, and there has never been any discrimination against them under the law. The fact is that at the time this act was passed there was no retirement law at all upon the statute books of the United States; so if the committee rely upon this act they certainly could not have relied upon any promise that after these officers received their discharge, they should be put upon the retired list and receive retired pay, because there was no such provision of law in existence at the time of the passage of this act. The first retirement law passed by Congress was a little more than one month later, on August 3, 1861. Let us see what that act provided. The only section which the committee claims has any bearing upon this proposition is section 16, which reads as follows:

And be it further enacted, That if any commissioned officer of the Army or of the Marine Corps shall have become, or shall hereafter become—incapable of performing the duties of his office, he shall be placed upon the retired list and withdrawn from active service and command and from the line of promotion, with the following pay and emoluments, namely, the pay proper of the highest rank held by him at the time of his retirement whether by staff or regimental commission, and four rations per day, and without other pay, emoluments, or allowances. (Approved Aug. 3, 1861.) (12 U. S. Stat. L., 287–291; sec. 1245, U. S. Rev. Stats.)

Other provisions of the retirement act provided for retirement, I believe, at the expiration of 40 years' continuous service. Every officer in the Civil War had the benefit of that retirement act; no volunteer officer was denied its benefit. It applied to them as well as to officers of the Regular Army. If any volunteer officer of the Civil War during the period of his service became incapable of performing the duties of his office, he was retired under this act and received retired pay. But the difficulty with the situation is, that after these thousands of officers were honorably discharged they could no longer come within the terms of the act; they were separated from the service for reasons entirely apart from those which provided for their retirement in this retirement act. Remember, Mr. President, that this act was passed only a little more than 30 days after the act of July 25 upon which the committee relies as a pledge or promise to these officers. Certainly on August 3, a little more than 30 days after the passage of the act, every volunteer officer in the service of the United States knew exactly what the intention of Congress was and under what conditions he would be retired with retired pay. So it can not be for a moment said that there was any pledge made by Congress or by Abraham Lincoln to these officers which has not been fulfilled to the very letter.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact that the officers of the Regular Army who, to use the Senator's expression, separated themselves from the Army by voluntary resignation prior to this time, ceased to get the benefit or were denied the benefit flowing from the retired-officers' act?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly; and that is true to-day. Any officer of the Regular Army who is separated from the service, except under the conditions that are provided for in our present retirement laws, receives neither retirement status nor retirement pay.

Mr. President, it seems to me that no Senator can claim that here is a pledge upon the part of the Government to place these officers upon the retired list with retired pay, because the very legislation referred to by them, and upon which they seek to base their claim for favorable consideration, shows that there was not a pledge; that there was not a pledge in the first place, because at the time this act was passed there was no retirement law in force, and, therefore, if they secured their commissions between July 25, 1861, and August 3, 1861, they could not have entered the service upon the belief that after the war was over they would have a retired status and retired pay, because there was no such law upon the statute books. If they offered their services subsequent to August 3, 1861, they could not then claim that there was any pledge, because by that time Congress had legislated upon the subject, and they were not entitled under the law to a retired status and retired pay at the end of the war if they were discharged from the service.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin is giving an exposition of the subject that must be appealing to all fair-minded men, and it seems to me a very great misfortune that Senators should be denied the opportunity of hearing this magnificent argument. I therefore, if the Senator will pardon me, suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, if I recall correctly, under the ruling of the Senate the right of calling a quorum has been denied unless some business has been transacted since the last call for a quorum has been made. There has been no business transacted since the last call for a quorum, except the Senator's own speech, since we had the presence of a quorum developed by a roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of California in the chair). If the point is made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], the Chair will rule that the point is not well taken. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Harding	McCumber	Smoot
Beckham	Hardwick	McLean	Sterling
Brandegee	Hitchcock	McNary	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Hollis	Nelson	Tillman
Colt	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Townsend
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Trammell
Curtis	Kellogg	Page	Vardaman
Dillingham	King	Poindexter	Warren
Fernald	Kirby	Ransdell	Watson
Gallinger	Lenroot	Saulsbury
Gronna	Lewis	Shafroth
Hale	Lodge	Sheppard

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. FALL and Mr. GRONNA answered to their names when called.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. ASHURST, Mr. PHELAN, and Mr. SHERMAN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, when interrupted by the suggestion of the absence of a quorum, I was attempting to show by the report of the committee itself that there had never been a pledge by Congress or by the Government to place volunteer officers of the Civil War after the war was over upon the retired list with retired pay. I called attention to the fact that the only act relied upon by the committee as conveying this promise was the act of July 25, 1861, which provided that those who should respond to the call for volunteers should be placed upon the same footing in all respects as members of the Regular Army; but at the time that act was passed there was no retirement law for officers of the Regular Army upon the statute books, and therefore at that time there could have been no promise held out to those who offered themselves under the terms of the act of July 25, 1861, that they would receive the benefits of a retirement system. The first retirement act was passed a little more than a month later, on August 3, 1861, and as to any who volunteered after that time they fully understood that there was no such pledge to them, because the terms of the act itself plainly indicated who would be entitled to the benefits of retirement; and that, unless they came within the terms of the act, there was no possibility of their being put upon the retired list with retired pay.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me plain that the proposed legislation now pending can not be justified upon the theory that there was a pledge or an obligation upon the part of the Government to these officers. If this bill passes at all, it passes as a gratuity to these men and not as the fulfillment of an obligation. I wish to discuss it for the moment upon the theory of a gratuity.

First, attention is called by the committee in its report to the fact that there is a precedent for legislation of this character in that Congress in 1828, I think it was, placed the officers of the Revolutionary War upon a retired basis with retired pay; but I call attention to the fact that we had a war in 1812, that we had another in 1848, and that no similar action has been taken with reference to the officers of either of those wars. There was a very good reason why action of this kind might be taken in the case of the officers of the Revolutionary War which would not hold good or be called forth with reference to the officers of other wars.

At the time of the Revolutionary War we had no strong Government and we had no such response to the call for volunteers as we had when Abraham Lincoln issued his various calls. The fact that we had an Army at all in the Revolutionary War was due very largely to the fact that there were patriotic men who, without any assistance from the Government and without that patriotic law which afterwards existed, raised companies and regiments and were responsible in a very much greater degree for the existence of the Revolutionary Army than were the officers of the Civil War responsible for the existence of the Army in the Civil War, because the response upon the part of the enlisted man in the Civil War came very largely from the call of Lincoln, from the call of his country, rather than through the personal efforts of the men who afterwards were officers of the various companies and regiments.

But, Mr. President, treating it as a gratuity, if it were not for the fact that, if this bill passes, it will create a precedent that will entail in the very near future a burden upon the Treasury of the United States of anywhere from $150,000,000 to $500,000,000 a year, I do not know that I should oppose its passage. It is not the five or six or seven million dollars that will be given to these retired officers of the Civil War that is alone involved in the passage of this bill; if this bill passes Congress, it seems to me we will be equally obligated to put every commissioned officer serving in the present war upon the retired list with retired pay when the treaty of peace shall have been made.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Let me suggest to the Senator that to be consistent and just according to the standard of the proponents of this bill we will also have to put all of the volunteer officers of the Spanish-American War upon the retired list as soon as they reach the age of retirement.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true; and while that, of course, would not involve perhaps a very great drain upon the Treasury, I do insist if this be a gratuity—and it is a gratuity—that the Congress can not afford to place a mortgage upon the Treasury of the United States for gratuities amounting anywhere, as I said a moment ago, from $150,000,000 to $500,000,000 a year for the next generation to come.

Mr. President, if sympathy for these men and the feeling of gratitude which we have toward them, as we have to all the enlisted men of the Civil War, were all that were involved we might say let this bill go through without protest—and I appreciate, I think, the fact that this bill is going to pass—but on account of the tremendous importance that it assumes because of the precedent that it will create, a precedent that very many Members of the Senate to-day will find confronting them who will still be here one, two, three, four, or five years from now, it is not a matter that should be lightly treated or one that should be regarded from the standpoint, "Oh, here is a paltry sum comparatively speaking, and let it go." I do not see how Senators who vote for this bill can, when this war is over, avoid voting for a like bill for every officer serving in the present war.

It is for that reason, Mr. President, that I can not favor the bill; it is for that reason that I have felt impelled to state my reasons why I can not support it. Not only has there been no pledge upon the part of the Government, not only are we under no obligation by reason of any promise made in the past Congress or otherwise to take this action, but if this action is taken it is taken purely as a gratuity, and the Senate should remember that if it gives this gratuity now it ought for the same reasons and because of the same argument give in a year or two a like gratuity to 200,000 or 500,000 officers who are serving in the present war, involving hundreds of millions of dollars of expense to the Government of the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. Why does the Senator say, Mr. President, "in a year or two," considering that we have waited 53 years before we have granted it for the officers of the Civil War?

Mr. LENROOT. I am very glad to answer the question of the Senator, Mr. President. If it is right and just that this bill be passed to-day it ought to have been passed 53 years ago.

Mr. McCUMBER. I was asking the question from the standpoint of the Senator that it was a gratuity only.

Mr. LENROOT. It is a gratuity; it is one which should be bestowed upon all in a like situation; and it would not be fair, from the standpoint of a gratuity alone, to let this matter run on for years, so that we would give some men a gratuity, but most of them may go to their graves without having it. If we are going to treat it at all as a gratuity we should treat them all alike, and we should do it at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the noes seem to have it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. KING. I move that the Senate adjourn, and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, and the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Hale	McLean	Sterling
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	McNary	Sutherland
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nelson	Tillman
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Townsend
Curtis	Kellogg	Poindexter	Trammell
Dillingham	King	Ransdell	Vardaman
Fernald	Lenroot	Saulsbury	Wadsworth
Gallinger	Lewis	Shafroth	Watson
Gronna	Lodge	Sheppard
Gulon	McCumber	Smoot

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] are detained on official business.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. FALL, Mr. HARDING, Mr. PAGE, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. WILFLEY answered to their names when called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK, Mr. POMERENE, and Mr. KENYON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Has the roll call disclosed a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to compel the attendance of the absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the order of the Senate.

Mr. CALDER entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to inquire whether or not the Sergeant at Arms has been informed of the order of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Washington that he is informed that the Sergeant at Arms is executing the order of the Senate.

Mr. PHELAN and Mr. NUGENT entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am informed by Senators who are opposed to the bill that they will consent to an agreement to vote on this matter to-morrow. Therefore I send a proposed unanimous-consent agreement to the desk and ask for its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed unanimous-consent agreement will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent that at not later than — o'clock p. m., on the calendar day of Thursday, June 20——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I should like to have that 2 o'clock. The Senator from Utah suggests 4 o'clock.

Mr. KING. As I understand, we will take an adjournment until to-morrow, and the morning hour doubtless will be occupied by the usual matters to come before the Senate, so that the resumption of the discussion upon this matter could not occur until 2 o'clock. I know that there are some observations to be submitted by other Senators, and I desire to submit a few myself.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Would the Senator agree to a recess until to-morrow at noon? Then the matter would come up and be disposed of right away. I do not know of any Senator who will want to occupy much time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should not like to take the responsibility of consenting to a recess.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then, suppose we have the agreement read "not later than 4 o'clock." Probably we can get a vote before that time.

Mr. KING. I have no doubt that we can reach a vote before 4 o'clock.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the proposed agreement.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m., on the calendar day of Thursday, June 20, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill S. 130, a bill to create in the War Department and Navy Department a roll designated as the "Civil War Volunteer officers' retired list," and so forth, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m., on said calendar day, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 30 minutes upon the bill, nor more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. KING. I suggest to make it 3 o'clock, because there will be some debate during the first hour when we take up this measure for consideration, and that should be unlimited.

Mr. TOWNSEND. All right.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask if it is the intention of the Senator from Michigan to take a recess?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am perfectly willing to do that as far as I am concerned.

Mr. KING. I shall ask for an adjournment because I think some Senators would desire to submit some matters in the morning. There will be reports of committees, and I do not think we ought to deprive Senators of the morning hour.

Mr. VARDAMAN. At what hour is a vote to be taken?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The vote is to be taken not later than 4 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan has asked unanimous consent for the agreement which has just been read. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. It is agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move to annul the order by which the Sergeant at Arms was directed to compel the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KING. If no other Senator desires to present any matter at this time, I shall move an executive session. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 20, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 19, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We draw near to Thee, Almighty God our Heavenly Father, that we may worship Thee in the beauty of holiness, renew our allegiance to Thee, and press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

Let Thy blessing crown our efforts as a people, our President and all others in authority, that they may be upheld in their efforts to bring peace out of a terrible war.

Protect our soldiers, sailors, and all others who are giving their support to a successful issue of the mighty conflict; and Thine shall be the praise for liberty, truth, justice, mercy; in His Name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 385. An act to authorize mining for metalliferous minerals on Indian reservations;

S. 4444. An act to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, or in the Boxer rebellion in China; and

S. 4631. An act to amend section 107 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, as heretofore amended.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 4631. An act to amend section 107 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, as heretofore amended; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 385. An act to authorize mining for metalliferous minerals on Indian reservations; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. 4444. An act to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, or in the Boxer rebellion in China; to the Committee on Pensions.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the naval appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 10854. Making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

Mr. PADGETT. I ask the Clerk to report Senate amendment No. 101.

Senate amendment 101, page 64, line 14: Improvements central power plant systems, including quay wall and fill at power house, $800,000.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendment. That was reserved at the time the bill went to conference by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]. We have had hearings upon the matter. At all of these stations it has been necessary to increase very largely the power-plant facilities with reference to heat, light, and power on account of the larger activities. A great part of this is for the necessity of having a quay wall with reference to the land mentioned in the amendment agreed to yesterday. This was left open, I presume, on account of that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the House how much of the appropriation is for extension of the power plant and how much is for the wall and fill? The reason that I reserved it was because we had no information about it, and I thought it might be a dredging proposition to fill in swamp land up there at the station. No one has any objections to increasing the facilities of the power plant, but I think there is objection to going ahead with sea-wall construction that can be postponed until after the war is over and utilize the fund for more pressing necessities.

Mr. PADGETT. Admiral Earle, who has charge of the torpedo-plant activity there, was before the conferees, and I called his attention to this amendment and asked him to explain it. He says—I am reading from page 660 of the hearings before the conferees:

Admiral EARLE. That is an addition to the original estimate obtained in the last congressional bill for the power plant. It has been found necessary to add this amount simply on account of the excess cost of the original project.

The CHAIRMAN. This embraces three different things. It embraces improvement of central power-plant system, and then you have a quay wall——

Admiral EARLE. And a fill.

The CHAIRMAN. And a fill at the power house; but the quay wall and fill at the power house is all one.

Admiral EARLE. The land on which the power plant is being built is practically made land, and the fill and quay wall for that are the items required here.

The CHAIRMAN. How much did we appropriate for that enlargement of the power plant in the former bill?

Admiral EARLE. It was $990,000, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that last year, you mean? Was it last year or year before last? There was not anything in the last bill.

Admiral PARKS. I have not seen the station yet, but my understanding is that that power plant had to be extended out on account of the small amount of land available there, and that necessitated this quay wall and fill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Glancing over the testimony, I find they are as vague as they possibly can be as to the amount of appropriation that will be utilized for the heating plant and how much for filling purposes in making land and for how much for a quay wall.

Mr. PADGETT. The hearings continue. I am reading from page 661:

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to have that segregated so that we will know how much is intended for the quay wall and the extensions, and the dimensions of that wall and the fill at the power house.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, did Admiral Parks tell us where any necessity arose for the immediate consideration of this? Admiral Earle said Admiral Parks called his attention to it, and he had only heard of it a very few days ago, and this is an awful lot of money for a power plant at Newport—a torpedo station.

Admiral PARKS. This arises wholly from the necessity for torpedoes, and a power plant was designed which was intended to be sufficient for the production of the torpedoes, and evidently the contracts for machinery, etc., were not let early enough, and prices have been increasing so rapidly that one element of the increase requested is on account of the great increase of the cost of electrical and mechanical equipment. Now, there was one matter there, of air compressors, which is a pretty large item, and awarded since I have been here; that is, within the last three or four months. The prices of those air compressors were certainly high, compared with what we used to have to pay for them, but there is a great increase in the price of all the mechanical equipment we have to buy at the present time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; he is giving information that air compressors, like all other machinery, have gone up tremendously in price. I can testify to that myself. How much of this enormous amount—of course, not very large when we consider that we are appropriating billions—is to be spent for the fill, how much for the quay wall, and how much for the heating plant? You can glance over this testimony and will not find any testimony on this important matter.

Mr. PADGETT. I asked him to insert these items, and I think they are here.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose the committee went on the theory that as the bureau chief asked for it, therefore it should be granted without any further inquiry.

Mr. PADGETT. No. Now, if the gentleman will turn to page 687 he will find this:

Admiral PARKS. On account of the large increase in the activities of the torpedo station incident to the war, it was found that the present obsolete and out-of-date power plant was totally inadequate to serve the purpose. It was therefore decided to construct an entirely new and modern power plant in a new section of the island. The space surrounding the old power plant was too restricted to permit of expansion. In order to start this work $850,000 was allotted from one of the bureau's appropriations, covering work for the Bureau of Ordnance. The additional amount now requested is to continue this work which is now under progress and provide for an extensive system of distribution for light, heat, and power from the new power plant to the various buildings on the island. The original estimate provided only for the power plant and did not include extension of the quay wall made necessary by the construction of this power plant, the filling, or the extensive distributing systems necessary.

It was necessary to fill in the site of the new power plant in order to provide space for the construction of this building without further encroaching on the limited area of this island. This made it necessary to extend for a distance of about 700 feet the present quay wall in order to retain the filling. The estimated cost of the filling with the surrounding quay wall is $149,000, the balance being necessary for the distributing system, intake and discharge tunnels for condensing water, and part of the power-plant equipment.

Power plant	$451,000
Distributing system	200,000
Quay wall	131,000
Fill	18,000

So we have a very detailed account of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Perhaps more detailed than is desirable when we consider that for an extension of 700 feet of quay wall it is estimated that an amount of $131,000 is required, or nearly $200 a foot. That is to be spent in these pressing times for building an ornate granite wall, which could be postponed until other times than now, when we need these funds so much for pressing war activities.

Mr. PADGETT. No; that is a misconception. If you have to dig down 20 feet into the subsurface to build a wall to support the power house and the activities there in manufacturing torpedoes, you will see that it is not a dream nor an ideal conception, but a practical necessity.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no necessity for building a granite-faced quay wall 700 feet in length at an expense of $131,000.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, here is a letter from the Secretary of the Navy:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 6, 1918.

MY DEAR SENATOR: It is desired that there be added to the pending naval bill, H. R. 10854, as introduced into the Senate April 22, 1918, page 49, line 9, the following items:

"Improvements central power plant and distributing systems, including quay wall and fill at power house, etc., $800,000." This amount is needed in order to complete the power plant now under construction at the torpedo station, Newport, R. I., and covers the cost of extensive distributing systems, sea wall, and fill at the power plant, and the great increase in the cost of electrical and mechanical equipment. In view of the increase of the activities of this station it was found necessary to increase the area of the island by considerable filling. The new power plant is located on this fill, which necessitates an extensive quay wall construction. This quay wall construction is also an important element in connection with the storage and handling of fuel.

The early completion of the power plant at the torpedo station is vitally needed, as the capacity of the plant has been and is being increased; for the work at the station, making and repairing of torpedoes, work of the highest importance, has largely increased and must continue to meet the needs of the Navy.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any specific information as to the character of this quay wall of 700 feet for which $131,000 is estimated?

Mr. PADGETT. It is a stone wall, but I could not tell the gentleman the size of the blocks or things of that kind.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has no information as to whether the matter could not be deferred until after the war?

Mr. PADGETT. Not when they say it is needed for the necessities of the present manufacture of torpedoes. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is but another instance of extravagant expenditure.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to recede from the House disagreement to Senate amendment No. 101 and to concur in the same.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I now call up Senate amendment 120 and move to still further insist upon the disagreement of the House to that amendment. I want to state in connection with that that the House committee had reported out a bill with reference to the Coast Guard. This Senate amendment embraces a part of the bill as reported by the House committee and other new matter. The conferees are in sympathy with the legislation. The Coast Guard is cooperating with the Navy and is a part of the Navy under legislation during the war. My idea is to have this sent back to conference in order that some proper amendments that have been suggested by the Secretary may be considered by the conferees and reported back to the House in an agreement.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman why somebody connected with the Coast Guard is not consulted in this matter.

Mr. PADGETT. They were. The House committee had a hearing, and Capt. Berthold and Capt. McAllister were present.

Mr. WALSH. I know; but that was before the measure went to conference. After the measure went to conference you had the Secretary of the Navy before the House conferees to express his views of the legislation and of the Senate amendment.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; I wanted to get his views. We had already gotten the views of the others and never had gotten the views of the Secretary, so that we would have the whole matter before us.

Mr. WALSH. You got the views of the Coast Guard officials, but you did not get their views of the Senate amendment, because the Senate amendment is entirely different from what the House provided.

Mr. PADGETT. It is not entirely different; it is somewhat different.

Mr. WALSH. It is radically different in several provisions. Can the gentleman state whether the House conferees or whether the gentleman personally is opposed to what would be section 1 of amendment 120?

Mr. PADGETT. Section 1 is the identical provision of the House bill.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but would the gentleman be opposed to having that redrafted so that instead of its reading "without regard to number or length of service in rank or grade" it should read "without regard to the number or length of commissioned service in rank or grade," so as to have it comport with the provisions of law applying to officers in the Navy?

Mr. PADGETT. I can not say whether I would or would not, because I have not considered that suggested amendment. This paragraph 1 was reported out in the language that it is here in this Senate amendment. The House has passed it, and the Senate has passed it in that manner. That is the language that is agreed upon by the officials of the Navy Department and the officials of the Coast Guard. That is the very language of the bill that the Coast Guard and the Navy agreed upon and sent down to our committee. Speaking for myself, and as I think for the others, the conferees want to go over this matter, and we are in sympathy with this legislation. I think the legislation should be enacted and should be enacted in this bill, because if it goes out of the bill it will be difficult to get consideration of a separate bill in the congested condition of the calendar.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state what there is objectionable about this amendment? The conferees being in sympathy with the legislation, why does he not move at this time to concur?

Mr. PADGETT. There are several matters in there that the Secretary has called attention to that I think ought to be considered carefully and more in detail than we can here.

Mr. WALSH. You have considered them and the Secretary has been before the House conferees and has expressed his views.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; and he has expressed his views adversely to some matters that I do not know I am yet prepared to take his views upon.

Mr. WALSH. I do not know what the intentions of the House conferees may be, but it would seem that the House conferees might well ascertain the views of some of the people in authority in the Coast Guard. I do not think that in providing for legislation for the Coast Guard simply because that branch of the service is now in the Navy the Bureau of Navigation or the Secretary of the Navy should be sole judge as to what legislation should be enacted as affecting that particular service.

Mr. PADGETT. That is not so. We called the two high officers of the Coast Guard before we called the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. WALSH. But that was before the Senate amendment was put into the bill.

Mr. PADGETT. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. You had the Secretary of the Navy before you since the Senate amended the bill?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. My observation was that it would seem not out of keeping with the proprieties to ascertain the views of the Coast Guard officials as to the Senate amendment which the gentleman is now moving to insist upon our disagreement to.

Mr. PADGETT. For the purpose of perfecting it and reporting it back. That amendment is in the hands of its friends.

Mr. WALSH. I am very glad to hear that, but I wanted to get some idea as to what particular phases of the amendment the House conferees were objecting to, and whether there were any other aspects than those pointed out by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. PADGETT. Let me say to the gentleman that the House conferees did not object to any specific part of it, for the simple reason that when this bill went to conference it was one of the items that was reserved out of conference and we were called upon to agree to report back to the House out of the conference report, and for that reason we did not take it up for consideration.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am anxious to know, if it is agreeable to the chairman, just a little more definitely as to the extent of his sympathies with this legislation, particularly as to line 19, on page 81, to line 5, page 82, in reference to the rank of the commandant of the Coast Guard, the engineer in chief, and I have also in mind certain senior captains who appear under lines 19 to 23.

Mr. PADGETT. That is legislation that is for two officers——

Mr. CRAMTON. I should have said lines 15 to 23, page 81.

Mr. PADGETT. Lines 19 to 23, beginning there. I will say to the gentleman I think frankly that personally it was my purpose to have a conference with some of the representatives of the Coast Guard people to get their views upon this matter. I have not yet formed an opinion as to whether I will or will not, because I have only investigated that particular phase of it that has been brought in. I have only investigated the Secretary's views about it, and I wanted to get the other side of it before I formed an opinion.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am very glad to hear the gentleman say so. Can the gentleman yield me two or three minutes to make a few observations in reference to this?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. How much time?

Mr. CRAMTON. Two or three minutes; perhaps five minutes.

Mr. PADGETT. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to know that the mind of the chairman, and I suppose of the conferees, is open on this proposition, because it is a matter in which many of us are very much interested. Now, I was sorry to note in the hearings that the Secretary of the Navy appeared to take a position adverse to a proper recognition of the officers of the Coast Guard. This Coast Guard was a branch of the service in the Treasury Department. It was taken over bodily into the Navy for the war, and I do not suppose anyone would do it consciously, but it is inevitable that a feeling of class might have somewhat to do in ruling against the Coast Guard as a sort of outsider in the Navy. As a matter of fact, there are 6,000 men in the Coast Guard——

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman permit me just at that point?

Mr. CRAMTON. Certainly.

Mr. PADGETT. I want to disabuse the gentleman's mind of that attitude of the Navy, and I want to do so in justice to the Navy.

Mr. CRAMTON. But the Secretary and Admiral Palmer have throughout——

Mr. PADGETT. I know, but allow me——

Mr. CRAMTON. Ruled against full recognition of the Coast Guard.

Mr. PADGETT. I want to do it with special reference to Admiral Palmer. We had two hearings upon that matter before the Committee on Naval Affairs. It developed in the first hearing that under the bill—if the gentleman wants to go into particulars, I will give some—it developed in the hearing before the Committee on Naval Affairs, the first hearing, that at a given date—I do not remember the date—there were 132 officers in the Coast Guard in the line. Of that number 31 had the rank of captain, a certain number of lieutenants, and so on down. Under section 1 of the bill, as it was presented, the captains would be increased to 78 and every other officer would be promoted to the next lowest rank except one, and the committee was at once impressed with the idea that that was legislation creating a Salvador army, where we were putting every officer at the top except one.

Mr. CRAMTON. Admiral Palmer makes a very good statement as to that.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. Now, the committee balked at that, and while the committee was hesitating at it Admiral Palmer talked with me personally and explained it, and came before the committee at the second hearing and explained that while it was true that under the legislation as proposed all of these men would be promoted up to the top, all the bottom would be left vacant, that these men were no longer operating as a unit, that they were distributed around through the Navy and worked as individuals with the Navy and not as a Coast Guard organization, and that they needed the men of that rank, and because of their experience they were valuable; and he talked and urged of us not longer to hesitate to report that bill in favor of the Coast Guard; but he was one of the best friends that they had, and I can not allow a criticism of him when I know that he made that appeal to me personally, and came before the committee and urged that we would pass legislation that would promote every officer to the highest and next highest grade except one in the organization.

Mr. CRAMTON. Do I understand that would have given promotion to all the Coast Guard officers, except perhaps the captain commandant? Is it not a fact that the Secretary of the Navy and Admiral Palmer both as yet have failed to urge any recognition for the four highest officers—captain commandant, the engineer in chief—I think that is the name—and the senior captains?

Mr. PADGETT. The Secretary of the Navy has not recommended a rank above that of commander. Now, in the bill here the Senate amendment provides for the ranking officer to have during the war, while they are operating with the Navy——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I will speak in my own time and yield the gentleman some more.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can never tell whether he is speaking in his own time or that of somebody else.

Mr. PADGETT. I was trying to explain this matter. The Secretary said he did not favor giving the rank of commodore to the ranking officer of the Coast Guard. He says that instead of his duties being increased they have been decreased.

Mr. CRAMTON. That is the point I would like to call attention to in my time.

Mr. PADGETT. He says that before the war the captain commandant of the Coast Guard had an organization and had the management of and the responsibility for his organization, but he says since they have been taken over into the Navy that organization has been dissipated, and that these men have been distributed as individuals with the Navy, and are working with the Navy as a part of it, under naval officers and as naval officers and not as a Coast Guard organization. And that therefore all of the duties and responsibilities and the work, practically, of the captain commandant has dissipated with this organization.

Mr. CRAMTON. Might I proceed there?

Mr. PADGETT. I was going to say to the gentleman, as I said a moment ago, that that was just one side of the matter. I have not yet made up my mind. I could not tell you now what I shall favor, because I do not know. I have not reached a conclusion. Before I reached a conclusion I wanted to have a conference with these men in order to get the viewpoint of the Coast Guard officers with reference to that matter. But I rose for the purpose of disabusing the mind of the gentleman and of the other Members of the House that Admiral Palmer entertained any ill will or disparity against the Coast Guard, because he pleaded for them and for this legislation more than any man, and it was on his plea to the committee that we reported out the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Then I will only say, Mr. Speaker, if I may have a few minutes now——

Mr. PADGETT. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON (continuing). That I hope Admiral Palmer may also make a plea for the men at the head of the Coast Guard who were in charge of that splendid organization in days of peace and were taken over with it into the Navy Department in time of war.

Now, the Secretary of the Navy, in his statement, or in his letter, to the Naval Committee, earnestly speaks of this matter, and says:

As for the promotion of the captain commandant of the Coast Guard to the rank of commodore the department does not approve this because the captain commandant has less responsibility and less authority than before the war began. The Navy has taken over entirely the operations of the Coast Guard vessels and Coast Guard personnel, and it believes that it is injurious to the morale of the service to give increased rank except where there is increased responsibility, and then only when it is necessary to facilitate naval administration and command.

And he urges certain amendments.

Now, the question in my mind is, If that man is up there with decreased responsibility it is not his fault; it is the fault of the Navy Department that seeks to practically ostracize him and leave him at his desk without increased responsibility.

Let me quote from the letter of Admiral Palmer. It is an excellent letter, for which he should have full credit:

The Coast Guard is now a part of the Navy, and unless we can have means of utilizing its experienced officers as a part of the Navy in their proper positions relative to all other officers of the Navy, then the original legislation which placed it under the Navy will to a great extent be nullified. The Coast Guard, for the period of the war, has lost its identity entirely as a separate organization. Its officers and men are considered as much a part of the Navy personnel as the officers and men of the reserve force of the Regular Navy are, and are assigned to duty accordingly. We have ships which have both Coast Guard officers and reserve officers on them, and we have stations where regular officers, Coast Guard officers, and reserve officers are on duty together. We could very easily have a ship commanded by a regular officer, a Coast Guard officer second in command, and reserve officers the juniors. In order to utilize the long experience of these Coast Guard officers it is necessary that they be given a rank commensurate with their experience, and whether it advances all of them to higher grades or not is immaterial

Now, that reasoning, it seems to me, should apply to the four men at the head of the service as well as to any of the others, and in this tremendous naval expansion that we have there must be duties somewhere in the Navy that the Captain Commandant of the Coast Guard can perform that will give him increased responsibility in keeping with the times. Why, the Coast Guard under peace times had 6,000 men and 229 officers. If we were to give them rank commensurate with the Navy they would have two and one-half rear admirals for those 6,000 men. Now, this legislation does not propose to make a rear admiral or even half of one. It proposes to give the captain commandant the rank of commodore.

Mr. PADGETT. That is a rear admiral of the lower line.

Mr. CRAMTON. Perhaps that gives one of that rank, but it is nothing extravagant. Now, at the present time they are finding places of responsibility for some of these men. For instance, one of those captains to whom they do not propose to give any increase of rank if the Secretary's recommendation is followed, I understand is in charge of the naval training school at San Pedro. Another one is chief of the staff of the twelfth naval district. Now, both of those positions are customarily occupied by naval officers of higher rank, and I do not see if these men are performing the service why they should not have the rank. And in addition it should be understood that these men are men who have had years of training, men who have been familiar with the handling of ships for years, who have been on board ships in active service for many years.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman permit me just at that point?

Mr. CRAMTON. Certainly.

Mr. PADGETT. We must bear that in mind with this qualification, that they have been operating small ships along commercial lines and not fighting ships along naval lines. But I am not speaking to their disparagement. I do not want a misapprehension to get out. I am friendly to these people and have a great regard for them.

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not want to lessen the gentleman's friendship, but the gentleman realizes that now in our expansion of the Navy it is necessary to take in men who have not had long experience in command of battleships, and many men are taken in and given responsible commissions who have not had the training and experience that these Coast Guard officers have had.

Mr. PADGETT. That is true, but not above captain and rank of that kind.

Mr. CRAMTON. These men, I understand, have had many years of actual experience at sea rather than at desks here.

Mr. PADGETT. I am pretty well informed on the general service, but as I stated to the gentleman a while ago, it is my purpose to get the views of the Coast Guard people as well as the other side.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will say to the gentleman that I had overlooked the hearings of Capt. Bertholf before the gentleman's committee, if they were published.

Mr. PADGETT. They were published.

Mr. CRAMTON. I endeavored to get his hearing before the Senate Committee and found that it was not published.

Mr. PADGETT. But ours were published. We had him there, and we had Capt. McAllister also on the bill that they had agreed upon. And the bill that they agreed upon and sent down as a joint recommendation did not contain these matters. But I am not using that to their discredit, because I have an open mind.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have not desired to get from the gentleman a positive expression of his position.

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, no.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have not wanted to outdo his patience. But I did want to impress upon him that there are Members who are interested in the desirability of retaining and encouraging the Coast Guard as an effective fighting force either in war times or peace times.

Mr. PADGETT. Of course, in peace times they are not a fighting force.

Mr. CRAMTON. They come pretty near to it sometimes; they render duty that is almost as heroic.

Mr. PADGETT. They have hazardous duties.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on my motion to further insist.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House further insist upon its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 120. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] has yielded to me a minute. I present, for printing under the rule, a conference report on Senate bill 1553.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Conference report on the bill (S. 1553) to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds concluded at Washington August 16, 1916, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed under the rule.

The conference report and accompanying statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 669).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1553) to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds concluded at Washington, August 16, 1916, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 2, and 5, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: in lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Provided, That no person who is subject to the draft for service in the Army or Navy shall be employed by the Secretary of Agriculture under the provisions of this act"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 12. Nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent or affect the breeding of migratory game birds on farms and preserves for the purpose of increasing the food supply."

And the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1553) to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds, concluded at Washington, August 16, 1916, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed upon.

The Senate receded from its disagreement to House amendments Nos. 1, 2, and 5.

The Senate receded from its disagreement to No. 3 with an amendment. The first proviso of No. 3 prohibited the expenditure of appropriation for the publication purposes. The amendment agreed upon was the second proviso, which prohibits the employment of any person under the provisions of this act who is subject to draft by the Army or Navy.

The Senate receded from its disagreement to amendment No. 4 with an amendment. The amendment No. 4 was a new section and stated that one of the objects of the bill was to foster the breeding of migratory game birds for food purposes. The amendment agreed upon is a new section providing that nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the breeding of migratory game birds for food purposes.

Managers on the part of the House.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, there is only one other Senate amendment that will call for a separate vote, and that is Senate amendment No. 170. I ask that the Clerk report that.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make any motion?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. I move that the House still further insist on its disagreement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House still further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 170, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 100, lines 5 to 10, inclusive, strike out the following: "nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premiums or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULD] want recognition?

Mr. GOULD. No.

Mr. PADGETT. I am entitled to recognition, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. I know; you have already made your motion. The Chair thought perhaps the gentleman from New York wanted to make a preferential motion.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a preferential motion.

Mr. PADGETT. I will let the gentleman make it before I conclude. I want to make a little explanation of three or four minutes.

The legislation as reported by the House committee and as passed by the House is identical with the existing law and with what has been in the naval appropriation bill since and including the year 1915. It is the old question of the manufacturers on one side and the laborers on the other. The House passed this provision. It has also been carried in the Army appropriation bill and also the fortifications bill, as I remember. We have had a number of discussions of it on the floor of the House. We have had a number of votes in the House on it, and the House has always voted in favor of the provision. Sometimes it came on the motion to strike out, and the House refused to strike it out. The committees have sometimes failed to report it, and then it was offered as an amendment, and the House always voted to insert it as an amendment.

We asked the Secretary of the Navy about this matter, and he stated that it was his recommendation that the legislation be left as it now exists and as the House passed it. He said that his labor conditions were getting along fairly satisfactorily, and that while there might be merit—I do not know that he used the word "merit"; perhaps that is my interpolation—while there might be merit in eliminating this portion of the House provision, he did not think it wise at this time to bring in a disturbing element and a new agitation.

With this statement I am going to leave the matter for debate with the House, and if a preferential motion is made we can take the vote on that.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 170 and agree to the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 170, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] makes a preferential motion that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 170 and concur in the same.

Mr. PADGETT. I believe I have control of the time in charge of the bill?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. The preferential motion of the gentleman from Iowa gives him an hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on his motion.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman does not want to do that.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not want to lose my hour's time.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman is entitled to reserve the time.

Mr. NOLAN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. NOLAN. To see if we can not come to some understanding as to time and as to the division of time for and against the motion.

Mr. PADGETT. I am going to yield to both sides.

Mr. GOOD. I have made a preferential motion. Under the rules of the House I am entitled to one hour on that motion.

Mr. BUTLER. It was so held on me yesterday.

The SPEAKER. You can not take the control of the bill away from the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GOOD. I do not care to take it away.

Mr. PADGETT. My understanding of the rule is that while I made my motion and while the gentleman from Iowa can make the other as a preferential motion and can discuss it, I have control of the time in charge of the bill and that I have an hour, and I am willing to yield to him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is entitled to an hour to advocate his own motion, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is entitled to an hour to advocate his motion. As to the division of the time, that is not the concern of the Chair.

Mr. PADGETT. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. GOOD. So far as I am concerned, the gentleman from Tennessee can control all the time. I want only 10 minutes myself.

Mr. GILLETT. Say 30 minutes to a side.

Mr. NOLAN. Yes; let us have 30 minutes to a side.

Mr. PADGETT. I will take the time for one hour, and I will yield one-half of it to the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER. In the meantime the gentleman from Tennessee moves the previous question.

Mr. PADGETT. I withdraw that, Mr. Speaker, because I do not want to shut off debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee withdraws his motion for the previous question.

Mr. PADGETT. I will divide the time half between myself and half with the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] will control the time on this side.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will control the time in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, and I will control the time in favor of my motion.

Mr. BUTLER. I will yield the control of the time to the gentleman from Iowa to dispose of it among gentlemen in favor of the motion made by the gentleman from Iowa, because I shall vote with the chairman of the committee, Mr. PADGETT, on this question.

The SPEAKER. Why not have the gentleman from Iowa control the time?

Mr. PADGETT. That is right. Let the gentleman yield his half to those advocating his side of it. I will yield the other half to the other side of the question.

The SPEAKER. The understanding is that the debate shall run not exceeding an hour, and that the gentleman from Tennessee shall control one-half the time and the gentleman from Iowa the other half, and do what they please with it. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, this provision has been in the naval appropriation bill, a similar provision has been in the Army appropriation bill, and a similar provision has been in the fortifications bill for several years, just as explained by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT]. But that provision when it came before the House was enacted into law in connection with another provision which prevented the use of any part of the money appropriated to be expended in connection with what is known as the stop-watch or Taylor system.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will my colleague kindly repeat the whole of that last sentence? There was so much confusion in the Hall that I could not hear it.

Mr. GOOD. The statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] is practically correct. This provision has been carried in the Army bill, the Navy bill, and the fortifications bill for several years. It was enacted, however, when it was coupled with a proposition to prevent the use of any of this fund for what are known as stop-watch devices. The situation now is this, that if the motion I have made is adopted, then in the Naval Establishment the Secretary of the Navy and those who have charge of the expenditure of these appropriations and of the employment of labor will be permitted to pay bonuses to speed up production, if it is necessary to speed up to win the war. To-day there are men driving rivets in shipbuilding yards who are capable of driving as many as 5,000 rivets a day if they are permitted to do so, but they are paid on the basis of about 1,000 rivets a day. A man drives his 1,000 rivets, takes his time to it, and as a result you have men doing one-fourth of the amount of work which they are capable of doing; and it is proposed to enact into law a provision which absolutely ties the hands of the Chief of Ordnance in the Navy and the Chief of Ordnance in the Army, so far as production is concerned. My friends, we have come to a time in America when we must speed up or keep our mouths shut with regard to production. It does not lie in the mouth of any man to criticize the lack of production and at the same time vote for a law to delay and hinder production. Every man must do all he can do, if we are to win this war, and you are not giving the opportunity to every man to do what he can if the Government is unwilling to pay labor for its maximum of production. We should encourage officials who have charge of the expenditure of these funds, that they should stimulate production to the point that every man was doing his best in order that our own part in this war may be the maximum of all our people.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I saw in the papers a few days ago that Mr. Hurley had taken under consideration the question of allowing bonuses to men in shipyards for excellence of performance in the driving of rivets. Under what authority does he do that, if the law already prevents it?

Mr. PADGETT. This only applies to naval appropriations.

Mr. GOOD. In the bill passed by the House two or three days ago—the sundry civil appropriation bill, carrying approximately $2,000,000,000 for the building of ships—there is no provision prohibiting the payment of bonuses—not a word in that law with regard to stop watches and bonuses—and any part of that fund can be used not only for paying bonuses in Government-operated shipbuilding yards everywhere except navy yards, but can also be used for the enforcement of the stop-watch or Taylor system.

Mr. BARKLEY. So that there is no law at present that prohibits the paying of bonuses in shipyards?

Mr. GOOD. In the navy yards there is.

Mr. BARKLEY. I mean in other shipyards.

Mr. GOOD. Not under the Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

Mr. PADGETT. And not in private yards, either.

Mr. GOOD. We have nothing to do with private yards.

Mr. PADGETT. This applies only to Goverument yards.

Mr. GOOD. This applies to the naval program so far as the appropriation for that kind of construction is concerned.

Mr. ROBBINS. In navy yards only.

Mr. GOOD. In Government navy yards only; but it is the announcement of the governmental policy. Are you going to have one policy for riveters and calkers at Hog Island, a Government yard, and another policy so far as the navy yards of the United States are concerned for the same character of work?

Mr. WALSH. Was there not an amendment offered to the sundry civil bill along lines similar to this provision?

Mr. GOOD. If there was, it was not adopted. It never has been carried in the sundry civil biil, nor has it been carried in any of the deficiency bills which have appropriated very large sums for the employment of labor in Government shipbuilding yards, and if we would cut all the politics out and confine our endeavor to the winning of the war it would not be here.

Mr. NOLAN. The gentleman knows that no amendment has ever been offered to any bill that would affect private contracts with the Government.

Mr. WALSH. I am not talking about private contracts. Hog Island is not a private yard. That is a Government yard.

Mr. NOLAN. The gentleman does not understand it, if he thinks that is a Government yard.

Mr. GOOD. I am only talking about this provision.

Mr. WALSH. I do not call the Emergency Fleet Corporation a private corporation.

Mr. GOOD. It only applies to Government establishments. Anyone who says that the Government shipbuilding yard at Hog Island is not a Government plant does not know what he is talking about. The gentleman has referred to the fortification bill. The fortification bill came to the Committee on Appropriations this year with the recommendation of the Secretary of War that this entire provision be eliminated.

I am frank to say that when this matter came before the House first, when we were at peace, coupled as it was with the proposition of the stop watch, I voted for it. It was claimed that the so-called Taylor system has operated against the laboring men. I would vote for it again under similar conditions; but, my friends, it seems to me that we have come to a time when we must pay bonuses. When every industrial establishment that tries to acquire quantity production is paying bonuses why should we tie the hands of the Navy Department or of the Ordnance Department of the Navy in this regard? Where a man can drive 5,000 rivets in a day you say to him, "You shall not do it." When a man can do a certain amount of work in a machine shop, under splendid conditions, without impairing his health, and he wants to do it to help win the war, and if he was in a private establishment he would be permitted to do it and would be paid for it, you say, "No; you can not do it. You stop work when you get so much done and let the standard of efficiency in the United States be the standard of the least efficient." I am not willing now, in this time of war, to write that kind of a provision into the statutes of the United States.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I visited a——

Mr. GOOD. I yield for a question.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I understand that these men who drive 5,000 rivets in a day lay off for four or five days; that they have exhausted their nervous energy so that they are not capable of working for four or five days, and hence it does not speed up production at all.

Mr. GOOD. I understand that is not a fact.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is a fact.

Mr. GOOD. Well, it is not a fact and no one having any knowledge of the situation ever claimed it was so. I understand that these men who work in the Ordnance Department who have a productive capacity that excels the capacity of a great many other men do work every day without impairing their health, and I say that now while we are at war, when we are asking every industry in the country to speed up, and every industry is speeding up, and every automobile factory and every ammunition factory controlled by private enterprise is permitted to pay bonuses, we ought not to prohibit it in Government establishments.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am not opposed to the payment of bonuses, but I am saying that these stunts in the driving of rivets do not increase the efficiency or speeding up of the work in many instances, for the reason I have stated, because they can not do that every day.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr LINTHICUM. I want to say that this man, Charles Knight, made the record in shipbuilding in driving 4,800 rivets, went to work the next day, and broke the hour record by driving 1,200.

Mr. GOOD. Has he quit work since?

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; he is working every day.

Mr. GOOD. I hope the gentleman will submit his proof to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER]. Now, gentlemen, I have here a letter from a gentleman now living in my town, who originally came from Baltimore, who has already received news that one of his brothers has been killed on the other side, and it is from such fellows as that and the boys we are sending on the other side that I want to hear from whether or not we should speed up. Here is what he says:

> The statement is also made that the Tavenner bill is part of the propaganda of Germany to defeat the output of United States ships to carry the war to a successful conclusion.
> The statement is also made that in some navy yards, as a result of bonus or reward offers, over 4,800 rivets have been driven by a single man, while the result of the passage of this bill will mean a reduction in the number of rivets driven per man to less than one-fourth.

This letter concludes with a strong demand that Congress should not enact legislation that will prevent our speeding up.

Certainly it must be a part of a German propaganda; anything that will stop production is in the interest of Germany and not in the interest of the United States. Every man must do his part, not only in the shipbuilding yards but in everything. At Hog Island and in the arsenals, wherever we put the man, he must do a man's part, and that is all he can do to win the war. All I am asking here is that we adopt the Senate amendment that permits the business policy adopted by every business establishment throughout the United States, a policy, as explained by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND], a man who holds a union card, a union man, that there can be no objection to it from any patriotic union man in the United States. [Applause.] It gives to labor its reward. It gives to a man an incentive to do more than he did the day before; and if we are going to win the war, if we are going to win it in a reasonable length of time, not only the labor must speed up, but Congress must be willing to pay that labor for everything it produces, and that is all that the amendment that I have offered will accomplish. Let us by our vote answer the last call of Joseph H. Choate—"Hurry up, hurry up; for God's sake, hurry up!" [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a personal statement, and in doing so I want to read into the RECORD for the information of the House a couple of telegrams. I want to say that I have always been very friendly to labor. I have endeavored at all times to promote by legitimate legislation its interest and its welfare, but I have received two telegrams that did not stimulate my kindly feelings. I want to read them so that the House may have the benefit of them:

PORTSMOUTH, VA, May 25.

Congressman PADGETT,
Washington, D. C.:

Just received advice that Senate amends House naval appropriation bill making possible bonus and Taylor system in navy yards. This measure, if it becomes effective, will undoubtedly cause walkout all manufacturing departments Government, as was done in similar instance over three years ago. Urge upon you to effect its defeat in House Monday.

W. B. WYATT.

NORFOLK, VA., May 25, 1918.

Hon. LEMUEL P. PADGETT,
Washington, D. C.:

G. H. T. U. 14824, of Portsmouth, Va., urge you to defeat in House Monday Senate amendment to Navy appropriation bill. If accepted by House, thereby making effective bonus and Taylor system in navy yards, will undoubtedly cause walkout of all Government yards, as was done similar occasions three years ago.

D. S. THOMAS, Secretary.

I am reading these at this time to let the House know that I received them. While I have been always the friend of labor I must confess that when I received these telegrams, instead of arousing within me a feeling of sympathy, I felt the devil in me as big as a bullfrog. [Laughter and applause.] I do not believe that it is the right spirit. It is not the right spirit in which to approach the House of Representatives in considering an amendment to legislation upon a great policy. I want to make that statement so that the House could debate it in the beginning and not at the end.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Is the gentleman aware that at the end of the Chamberlain bill, which became a law a few days ago, there is a provision written into the law giving the President the power to draft into the military service of the United States, without regard to residence, experts in industry and agriculture?

Mr. PADGETT. That is legislation subsequent to this.

Mr. CANNON. I know, but that is the law. I have wondered, that being the law, if the threat contained in the two telegrams might not result in action, and whether or not, if these gentlemen were informed that that is the law, they would care to enter the military service at $30 a month.

Mr. PADGETT. That is a question for everyone to answer for himself.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know whether these men know it or not, but it seems to me that if they do know it, if they do know that that is the law, and it ought to be the law—I do not suppose there is any disposition to use it on the part of the administration unless it becomes necessary—it would discourage telegrams of that kind. I think we all receive similar telegrams from all over the country.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. In order that we may confine the debate to the exact issue, the gentleman from Tennessee will agree with me that the Taylor system is not involved in this amendment; the only thing involved here is the payment of bonuses.

Mr. PADGETT. And premiums.

Mr. KEATING. If the gentleman from Tennessee will yield, I think it is only fair to state that the bonus and premium is a part of the Taylor system, and the gentleman's statement is not quite correct. The bonus and the premium are all a part of the Taylor system, and you can not have one without the other.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN].

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I have no defense to make of men, whether they be officers of an organization or not, who send such telegrams as have been read by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. I believe in conciliation and mediation. I believe that no organization and no set of men are justified during this great emergency, whether they be workmen employed by the Government of the United States or whether they be employed by contractors, to threaten a strike because of proposed legislation. I am not in sympathy with the spirit that prompted the telegrams, neither do I think they ought to affect the judgment of the House on this important question.

The people that are in favor of stop-watch methods of efficiency and the bonus and premium systems of payment that follow this system have been guilty of carrying on a campaign of misrepresentation in connection with this section of the naval bill, and the retired naval officer that the gentleman from Iowa speaks of—Capt. Stayton, who represents the Navy League—is largely responsible for the feeling engendered in the Middle West by his misstatements, as I will presently show from an extension of remarks of the gentleman from Nebraska in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under date of June 13.

Every effort is being made by the wage-adjustment board of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, the Shipping Board, and the National War Labor Board to adjust not alone labor troubles in war industries, but in every other industry in the country during the period of the war, and I trust that out of the efforts some permanent good may come regarding the adjudication of industrial disputes in this country. On the other hand, there has been carried on from Washington a propaganda that has disturbed the men working in all of the Government establishments of the country regarding this sort of legislation. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] does not understand the situation in the shipbuilding industries of this country nor in the Government establishments, nor does he understand the principle involved or he would not make the statement that the bonus and premium payments are not part of the Taylor system. They go hand in hand with the stop-watch and time-measuring devices, and for that reason this second section has always been considered a vital part of this legislation and has been attached to all appropriation bills and was only stricken from this bill in the Senate on motion of a Senator who advocated and voted for the use of the stop watch.

Mr. GOULD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. GOULD. Do they use the stop-watch method in foundries where bonuses might be paid?

Mr. NOLAN. Only where the Taylor system is involved, and these establishments are few and far between. No concern in this country that has any interest in the welfare of their employees uses any part of the Taylor system. Here is the situation in the navy yards of this country: There is no restriction whatever on piecework nor the amount of money that the men might earn. There is no restriction whatever on daywork, and absolutely no restriction of output, and the Secretary of the Navy has taken the position that he has means at his command and at the command of his subordinates to determine when a man is doing a fair day's work and whether the Navy Department is receiving adequate return for the money paid.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I presume this is a confession of ignorance on my part, but I would like to know, and I imagine some others would like to know who have not heard this question discussed, how the Taylor system operates and what the effect of it is.

Mr. NOLAN. I could not give the gentleman even an idea of it in 10 minutes. First of all, it is primarily based on the stop-watch method of time study, basing the production obtained and the time unit obtained under the stop-watch method in determining the output of each individual mechanic, generally taking the most highly efficient mechanic and basing the standard of all of the workers in the plant on this man's output when working at abnormal speed under ideal conditions, and making payment for the task set plus the bonus and premium payments, which the House has frequently decided was not fair and should not be established in Government plants.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] referred to Capt. Stayton. I want to call attention to this gentleman's activities in the Middle West, and I call attention to an extension of remarks in the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. DAN V. STEPHENS, in which Mr. STEPHENS says:

I have a stenographic report of Capt Stayton's speech at Norfolk, Nebr., in which he states:

"They have passed through both Houses a bill which says it shall be held lawful to say how many rivets they may drive, and Nebraska's Members of Congress all voted for it."

What do you think of a retired naval officer that will go around the country making misleading statements of this kind, that only tends to arouse class feeling and hatred during the war? An active pro-German propagandist that would make these statements would be imprisoned. This man represents the Navy League, that has been discredited on account of similar misleading statements by its officers concerning the efficiency of the Navy since we entered the war.

Mr. STEPHENS has a stenographic report of this gentleman's speech in Nebraska. He has been going throughout the Middle West creating dissension among the farmers with such statements as that. The gentleman from Nebraska has made an extended address. In fact, he has exposed this man in a letter written to the Chamber of Commerce of Omaha, Nebr., concerning the actions of Capt. Stayton and his whole line of argument, which has been a campaign of misrepresentation, and in some places has made false statements for the deliberate purpose of stirring up the people of this country with the idea that the men employed in the industrial establishments are slackers and are not doing their bit.

I want to call attention to the facts in connection with the Wage Adjustment Board and production in the shipyards. The Wage Adjustment Board met first in the city of Washington to adjust the wage question in the Pacific Northwest, the Puget Sound district. They were here for some time. Trouble arose in San Francisco, and they went there to settle that wage question on the Pacific coast. They settled wage rates for the basic trades all over the Pacific coast, and also the piecework rates. They came East and then settled the wage questions all over this country. They took the rates put into effect on the Pacific coast for the basic trades, and for piecework, and they have established them in every industrial section of the country where we are building ships—in the South Atlantic, the Gulf States, the Atlantic coast, the north Atlantic, the Delaware River, the Great Lakes, and the Pacific coast districts. Every shipyard in the country to-day building ships for the Government of the United States, whether they be for the Navy or for the Shipping Board, is working under the rates set by the Wage Adjustment Board, connected with the Emergency Fleet Corporation. Here is the position these men have taken regarding bonus and premium payments: They found a condition in this country where the shipyards or industrial establishments that would come under the provisions of their award would be competing against another shipyard or another industrial establishment to get the better class of mechanics, offering additional inducements in the way of cash payments. It does not make any difference whether these cash payments are called bonus or premium or an addition to the hourly rate or the daily rate. They found this created a disorganized condition. They found one establishment getting the cream of the men, because it was willing to pay more, and then asking the Shipping Board, through the Wage Adjustment Board, to make allowances for the increases granted. Every wage and every piece rate has been passed on before it was put into effect. The employers would come to the Wage Adjustment Board and say they would put into effect this rate, a higher rate than the Wage Adjustment Board had set, asked the Government to make allowance for the increases they granted to the men, but the Wage Adjustment Board and the Fleet Corporation would not allow it, and they took this position in the Delaware River award, and I am going to quote it to you out of their hearings, held in Philadelphia upon the Delaware River wage rate.

Here is the Wage Adjustment Board's findings on the bonus and premium system of payment:

> In addition to the straight day wage and the piece-wage systems we have found in operation in different yards numerous bonus, premium, and contract systems of wage payment. The minimum-wage scale and the piece-rate scales which we prescribe are designed to introduce a greater degree of uniformity in connection with wage payments. We, therefore, direct that no bonus or premium in addition to the rates of wages prescribed in this award shall in future be paid, except with the express permission of this board. This is not intended, however, to prohibit shipyards from paying piece rates to employees in other occupations than those covered by the appended piece-rate scales.

The board that rendered this decision is made up as follows: Mr. V. Everitt Macy, president of the National Civic Federation, appointed by the President, representing the people; Mr. Louis A. Coolidge, of the United States Shoe Machinery Co., representing the employees; and Mr. A. J. Berres, secretary of the Metal Trades Department of the American Federation of Labor, representing labor. Mr. Coolidge was selected by the employers and Mr. Berres was selected by Mr. Gompers to represent the workers. I think this will be conceded to be a representative and impartial tribunal. This action was taken to stabilize the production in the shipyards of the country and to stop disorganization, to stop men going from one yard to another because they were offered greater inducements. Here is the position. I happen to know this of my own knowledge. I have taken the matter up with the Wage Adjustment Board and I find they have taken this position: Whether the employer asks for permission to put in effect a raise in pay or increase in piece prices and is willing to pay it out of his own pocket, or whether he asks the Government to make an allowance for it, the position of the Wage Adjustment Board is that the shipyards can not pay above the rates they set, you can not pay any cash award, and the reason for it is to stabilize labor in the great shipyards, and after a year's investigation and a year of experience, they have found that the best thing that we can do is to stop the bonus and premium systems, which do not prevent piece-work rates in every line of business, and they are getting better results.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NOLAN. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And contracts for the building of ships are let based on the scale of wages made in that report?

Mr. NOLAN. Absolutely; prices are fixed.

Mr. BROWNING. Would the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I will for a question.

Mr. BROWNING. Does the gentleman think that the department is getting the maximum amount of labor at the present time?

Mr. NOLAN. Every yard in this country that has had any experience, that has had a chance to build up an organization, is producing results. Let me quote you here some information I gave to the gentleman from Nebraska. I insert a newspaper clipping from the San Francisco Bulletin of June 3, 1918, to prove that the shipyard workers and the employees around San Francisco Bay are doing everything within their power to stimulate production by offering prizes for the best records made by the workers, and there has not been one word of protest from the men or their organizations. It is high time that organizations, individuals, or any agency that circulate false and slanderous statements about the workers of this country should be called to account and if they can not make good they should be jailed as enemies of this country. The Bulletin article is as follows:

> R. S. Brown has been returned the winner of the Bulletin's riveting contest for the Schaw-Batcher plant for the week ending Saturday, and will be awarded the Bulletin's prize of $25 offered to the man making the best riveting record for the week. Brown led on four out of five working-days of the week. Brown set a terrific pace during the entire week, most of his work being on a shell under difficult conditions. He drove common-head rivets, which require calking, and all of his riveting was water-tight work. On the first day of the contest he broke a world's record. While there are no definite standards of comparison, owing to the widely varying conditions of shipbuilding work, officials at the plant said Brown's performance was undoubtedly among the world's best showings for a single week's work.
> The Union Works leaders were so closely bunched that no decision could be announced to-day. The counting department of the works is reviewing the records, and a decision probably will be announced to-morrow. Young, Stewart, and Fetisoff, all star riveters, came under the tape so close together that this special survey of the week's work was made necessary. At both plants the men were highly commended for the week's showing, and although Memorial Day being a holiday cut into the week's total the returns for the five days were among the best for any similar period in the history of the two plants.
> The big Oakland contest, with three plants, the Bulletin offering a $25 prize for the leader in each plant, started this morning. Next week the Vallejo shipbuilders, competing for the same prize, will show what they can do in the way of knocking out destroyers.
> TYNAN ACCEPTS ARMES'S $10,000 RIVETING WAGER.
> Coincident with the beginning of the Oakland week of the Bulletin's riveting contest, J. J. Tynan, general manager of the Union Iron Works, has accepted the offer of a $10,000 wager by George Armes, president of the Moore Shipbuilding Co., that a gang of Moore riveters can beat any gang in the world. Tynan read of Armes's challenge while on his way West after a business trip to New York and Washington. From Julesburg, Colo., he sent the following telegram to San Francisco:
> "I accept George Armes's challenge of $10,000 to be posted as a wager that a team from any department of the Moore Shipbuilding Co. can defeat any similar team from any other yard in the United States.
> "J. J. TYNAN."

Armes, in issuing his challenge last week, criticized many claims to riveting prowess made throughout the East and in England, saying that investigation would show that the spectacular records were for "snap" riveting on inside water-tight work, and that competition with the countersunk, water-tight rivets, where it is necessary to calk the rivet with a flush die, would tell a different story. He believes he has some world-beating gangs. On the arrival of Tynan plans for the big sporting event probably will be concluded. It will be necessary to standardize the competition to insure a contest under as nearly as possible even conditions.

Tynan already has a personal wager of $5,000 with Vice President Powell, of the Bethlehem Steel Co., pitting the Union Iron Works against the company's Fore River plant in this year's output of destroyers.

Mr. BROWNING. We have information here from Admiral Parks, I do not know whether the gentleman has seen it or not, in which he says:

> All the information I have indicates that less useful work is secured for the $4.40 than was formerly secured for $1.60, and some have placed it as low as 65 per cent. The other thing is the increase in the cost of material.

Mr. NOLAN. The answer that I make to this statement is that Admiral Parks shows about as much knowledge of the true conditions obtaining in the mechanical establishments of the Navy as the average naval officer does and that is nothing at all. This will continue until Admiral Parks and others like him are sent to sea to do the things they were educated at Annapolis to do and leave the running of the navy yards to practical mechanics who have devoted their lives to shipbuilding and other mechanical operations.

Mr. BROWNING. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. NOLAN. The gentleman can get some time, I want to get through. I want to call attention to this fact. We on the Pacific coast, instead of the labor organization and men objecting to speeding up, there is a series of contests going on for a week at a time—it is not for a day—to see what a man could do, but it is for a week, and that is a fair test. I want to tell you the prize they are getting. The prize offered by the newspapers at San Francisco Bay is $25 for the greatest production in each individual shipyard for a week and that is based upon the man's earnings, the amount of money that he gets in his pay envelope on Saturday night. Mr. Armes, the general manager of Moore & Scott Shipbuilding Co., at San Francisco, issues a $10,000 challenge to the world in a riveting contest, to the world in a riveting contest where the contest will be fair and conditions of the driving of rivets similar, and they are waiting for someone outside of San Francisco to take up this wager. The general manager of the Union Iron Works at San Francisco has accepted the challenge on behalf of his men and the contest will soon be on. This latter yard led all the shipyards of the country for the month of May with an average of 64,000 rivets per day for the month. That is the situation out there where the yards are highly organized, almost 100 per cent, absolutely no attempt on the part of the organization or the employees to restrict production.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. Can I have two minutes more?

Mr. PADGETT. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 14 minutes remaining.

Mr. PADGETT. That is a mistake somehow. However, I will yield two minutes to the gentleman from California.

Mr. NOLAN. I want to say to the House that every attempt on the part of Congress to interfere with the policy of the Navy Department or the War Department or the Shipping Board regarding labor has caused a great deal of unrest and dissatisfaction. I believe it is the cause of these telegrams. It gets the men worked up and when you find men like Capt. Stayton going around the country representing the Navy League and making the sort of statement he made in the State of Nebraska you can expect some sort of a reaction on the part of the other side. I am going to ask permission to extend my remarks by including a resolution passed by the annual convention of the American Federation of Labor. This resolution was passed June 14 at St. Paul, Minn., and particularly protests against the Senate amendment which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] would have us agree to.

ST. PAUL, MINN., June 14, 1918.

The American Federation of Labor convention unanimously adopts the following resolution which urges Congress to restore the language in the naval appropriation bill which was eliminated by the Senate and to incorporate the same anti-Taylor system proviso in appropriation bills which have carried it heretofore:

"Whereas the American Federation of Labor has repeatedly gone on record against the introduction in the arsenals and navy yards of the United States of the Taylor system and similar systems of shop management; and

"Whereas a drive appears to have recently been made by associations of manufacturers and chambers of commerce against the reenactment of legislation which for several years has been incorporated in appropriation bills passed by Congress, followed by the Senate of the United States on May 22, 1918, eliminating from the naval appropriation bill the portion of this legislation which prohibits premium and bonus systems of payment, while leaving the portion which prohibits the use of stop-watch time study; and

"Whereas a very high degree of efficiency, which has been demonstrated is attainable without the use of such drastic systems of shop management; and

"Whereas the President of the United States and the Council of National Defense have urged legislatures not to lower the standards of labor or withdraw any of the safeguards which have been thrown around it during the period of the war: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the thirty-eighth annual convention of the American Federation of Labor reiterate its former position against the introduction of these systems of so-called scientific management, and urge Congress to restore the language above referred to which was eliminated from the naval appropriation bill in the Senate and to incorporate the same anti-Taylor system proviso in the appropriation bills which have carried it heretofore; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Speaker of the House and President of the Senate be advised of this action."

Gentlemen, I trust the House will defeat the motion of the gentleman from Iowa and adopt the motion of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. Both of these propositions go hand in hand. You can not have the Taylor system unless you have the bonus and premium system, and you can not have them unless you have the stop watch. You are only putting into this bill a law to disturb conditions in the mechanical establishments conducted by the Navy and against the advice of Secretary Daniels. It does not extend to the shipyards. The Wage Adjustment Board, for the purpose of stabilizing production, for the purpose of increasing production throughout the country and obtaining the best results, have thought it best to put into effect an order to prohibit the bonus and premium system——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Who appointed the board which made the decision to which the gentleman has referred?

Mr. NOLAN. The President of the United States appoints one man, the United States Shipping Board another, and the American Federation of Labor the third.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And that board specifically and officially reported against the bonus system?

Mr. NOLAN. Without any solicitation on the part of labor or the employees, they came to the conclusion that the bonus and premium system of payment in the shipyards tended to curtail rather than increase production.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I wanted the gentleman to bring that out.

Mr. NOLAN. It is through their own experience and without any opposition from anybody.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I will.

Mr. ROSE. Is it the policy of the Government now to refuse private corporations the right to pay bonuses to any of their employees, and then let that bonus enter into the question of cost?

Mr. NOLAN. They will not permit it to be paid in any part of the country, because they feel it will disorganize shops and disorganize the shipyards. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state what the resolution to which he referred is about?

Mr. NOLAN. It is a resolution adopted by the American Federation of Labor protesting against the Senate amendment, which would permit of the Taylor system of bonus and premium payments. This resolution is dated June 14, 1918, and was adopted by the annual convention now in session at St. Paul, Minn.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, as has been said by both gentlemen who have just debated this amendment, the amendment we now have under consideration concerns only the payment of premiums and bonuses to Government employees as a reward for extra labor performed. When we passed this amendment in the House it contained, first, a limitation providing that the stop watch or any other kind of measuring device should not be used to make a time study of the length of time necessary to do a given piece of work, and the second provision provided against the payment of any premiums or bonuses. Now, the Senate has retained the prohibition against the stop watch or any other time-measuring device, but has refused to write into the bill the prohibition against the Government paying a bonus or premium to a man who is willing and able to speed up his efforts in this hour of his Government's great need.

I am in favor of the motion to concur in the Senate amendment.

The present is certainly no time for the Government of the United States, through congressional action, to give recognition to the contention that the slowest man in the factory or on the job should set the pace for all the rest of the workers who are engaged in that particular enterprise.

If there is any worker who is willing to speed up, and can do so without injury or hurt to himself, he should be allowed to do so, and the Government should be permitted to pay him a reasonable bonus or premium as a reward for his industry. No sound argument can be urged against it.

Now, the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN], who so persuasively argues for his side of the contention, says that Congress ought not to undertake to interfere with the labor policy of the War Department or the Navy Department. Well, I call your attention to this fact, and I especially direct the attention of the gentleman from California to it, that Congress originally enacted this so-called Tavenner amendment over the express protest of the Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker, and the Chief of Ordnance, Gen. William Crozier, and in the face of their explicit statements that "to prohibit the system of which the record shows undoubted advantages, both to the Government and the employees, because of a charge unsupported by evidence seems to be most unwise."

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. The gentleman is certainly mistaken in the statement that that was passed over the protest of the Secretary of War.

Mr. BLACK. I am not mistaken.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I will read from a statement by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BLACK. I said the Secretary of War.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I beg your pardon. I thought you said the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BLACK. I said the Secretary of War, and the letter to which I have referred was written to the Speaker of the House when the Tavener amendment was before Congress in 1916. Now, the proposition, gentlemen, is this: In the present time of great stress and need is the Congress of the United States going to deny the man who is willing to speed up on the output of his labor the opportunity to do so and deny him any incentive for extra effort? We have called upon the farmers of the Nation to produce larger crops than ever before, and what is their answer? Notwithstanding that thousands of our most experienced young men have left the farms and have gone into the Army and no one has been found to take their places, except the women and children, the farmers have answered the call of the Nation with one of the largest wheat crops that has even been produced in this country, and the farmers of the South are now cultivating and have the prospect of harvesting a very large cotton crop, and besides that, are producing large amounts of diversified feed crops. To dig a living out of the ground requires endurance, courage, and association with the sun and the soil, and certainly the inspiring lesson of what the farmers are doing to meet the increased needs of the Nation should not be lost on the rest of the country, and more especially upon the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the placing of restrictions on production at a time like this merely to satisfy the exactions of some of those who claim to speak for union labor has the effect to place the interests of a class above those of the common good. I do not believe that union labor would desire it if the rank and file were consulted. It is a blind man who can not see that the United States is facing the most stupendous task that it has even undertaken to accomplish, and I am not going to place myself in the attitude where our soldiers at the front can say "that you voted to draft me to stem the tide of onrushing German savagery and to bare my bosom to the whirling bullets and the bayonet's thrust in defense of American liberty and the asperations and ideals of a free Government, but that when a proposition came up to limit and retard the production of the things which are so vitally needed to successfully prosecute the war you gave it your support."

It is my desire as a Member of Congress to treat all alike. To assume that every man wants to do his duty in the hour of his country's peril and to give him ample opportunity to do so, I shall therefore vote to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. PADGETT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, we have discussed the Taylor system so often that it would appear to be unnecessary to go into the matter again. The proposition before the House is to adopt a Senate amendment to the naval appropriation bill.

I think we will all agree that the man best qualified to pass upon the desirability of this amendment is the Secretary of the Navy, the head of the Navy Department. I do not question either the intelligence or the patriotism of my good friend from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], or my equally good friend from Texas [Mr. BLACK], but I submit to the common sense of this House, what do they know about the operations of the Navy Department? If you gentlemen were seeking information concerning that department, if you wanted to learn how to make that department efficient, where would you go? You would go to the Secretary of the Navy. Now, what does the Secretary of the Navy say about this proposed amendment? He appeared before the conferees appointed by this House and stated his position so clearly that no one can possibly misunderstand him, and, instead of submitting my own views to the House, I want to submit the views of the Secretary.

Secretary Daniels, responding to a question propounded by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. RIORDAN], a member of the Naval Affairs Committee, said:

> I wish the Senate amendment stricken out and to pass it as the House passed it. I think we ought to insist upon the bill as it passed the House.

Proceeding, he says:

> We have discussed this matter often. If you put that in it will produce dissatisfaction among the men who are building ships and repairing ships, and they are doing excellent work, in the main. They have done better work than they have ever done.

Gentlemen on the floor of this House who probably have never seen a shipyard dare arise here and indict the great body of American workers. Why, gentlemen, do you not realize that if labor is not loyal in this crisis, we can not win the war, and the reason we can win the war and will win the war is because labor is loyal and because labor is doing its full part. The telegrams read by the chairman do not represent the attitude of the workers. Every responsible labor leader is opposed to strikes at this time.

I want to very earnestly resent and deny the charge made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] that labor is "lying down" during this great crisis when our country is leading a world war; and I submit as the best witness on that point the Secretary of the Navy, who is in charge of operations. Proceeding with his testimony before the House conferees, Mr. Daniels said:

> They—
> The workers in Government establishments—
> have done better work than they have ever done, and in spite of the coldest winter we have ever seen these men have measured up, most of them, well, and they are now very enthusiastic and earnest, not only in the work they are doing but in the spirit they have toward the war. I think that in most of the yards more than 90 per cent of the men took bonds and subscribed to the Red Cross fund. Everything is coming along finely, and they are showing a spirit toward the war that is splendid. I do not know anything that has heartened me so much as the feeling that the men building and repairing ships really feel they are in the Navy in every way. You put this thing in and immediately they say you are going to put the Taylor system back, and it is going to reopen an old controversy that will not do us any good.

That is the plea I make to the Members of this House to-day. The President of the United States and his Secretary of the Navy have determined upon a well-defined labor policy, a policy which is producing results, a policy which is making records in this country, and I appeal to the Members of this House not to permit anyone to toss a monkey wrench into the machinery. I ask the Members of this House to indorse the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RUBEY). The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, of course labor is loyal and will continue to be loyal to everything that the country needs in this great crisis. But no harm can come to labor by authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to give them a bonus for speeding up. If there is anything in the world we need it is speeding up. We are demanding that the President of the United States shall speed up in the manufacture of guns and ammunition, in the raising of food supplies. We are demanding that he shall speed up by raising a greater Army, by building more ships, by furnishing the facilities to send our men abroad, so that they will be on the battle line. And why should we not authorize the Secretary of the Navy to speed up in the preparation of the facilities to do these things that the President, as the Commander in Chief of the American Army and Navy, may require to be done?

The Congress of the United States and the people of the United States demand a vigorous prosecution of the war, and they demand that every man, great and small, laborer and capitalist, influential and noninfluential, organized or unorganized, shall do everything within the power of the Nation to win the war.

There is only one question at issue. That question is the honor of America, and no man and no set of men should have the power to take an attitude that will prevent the constituted authorities from exercising every power within the Government to speed up.

We are not asking anybody by this provision of the bill to do anything more than to accept a bonus for speeding up. In God's name, shall we say that the Government shall not have the power to speed up? Shall there be hours fixed during the war within which men shall work? Can you win a war by putting men on the battle line and saying, "You will only be compelled to fight between 6 o'clock in the morning and 12 o'clock at noon?" The men who go to the front are required to fight night and day, without hours. Without cessation, they must submit themselves to the bullets of the enemy, and there are no hours there.

So I say that we, who are not in the battle line, owe a duty to those who are, and it should be our duty and our pleasure to protect and fortify them in every way, so that they may bring back the flag of the Union untarnished, filled with the glory of victory. This amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is but an attempt on the part of the Representatives of the people to give evidence to our men at the battle line that we are in harmony with what they are attempting to do, and that all, everyone, labor and capital, shall be employed to the fullest possible extent to win victory for American arms. [Applause.]

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEPHENS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Maryland made reference to the number of rivets that are being driven under certain contest conditions, and I desire in connection with that statement to read a telegram from the gentleman appointed by the Labor Department to investigate the progress of the shipbuilding program on the Pacific coast. He says:

[Telegram.]

SEATTLE, WASH., May 9, 1918.

SECRETARY OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C.:

Actual scientific survey for planning division of Shipping Board, under direction of Dr. Henry Suzzallo, president University of Washington, submitted to Shipping Board March 4, and covering the eight steel shipyards in Washington and Oregon, shows average, including pick-up and all classes of most difficult rivets, of 258 rivets per gang driven in eight-hour shifts, and an average of 347 on approximately straight-away work. These averages based upon approximately 900 rivet gangs and 5,000,000 rivets. Most competent opinion, checked by records, establishes a good standard for riveter driving all classes at 300 per eight hour day. This vitally depends on sufficient quantity of air at proper pressure, efficient planning of work, and maintenance of tools. Unions placing no restriction on number of rivets driven. No material changes of significant proportions in yard conditions since report submitted. In some types of difficult work 60 rivets is a good day's work. Statement that the general average per day is 60 rivets is absurd.

HUGHES.

I also quote from San Francisco Bulletin of recent date news items giving records of contests in rivet driving, which completely discredits the charge that every effort is not being put forth by labor in this crisis.

TYNAN ACCEPTS ARMES'S $10,000 RIVETING WAGER.

Coincident with the beginning of the Oakland week of the Bulletin's riveting contest J. J. Tynan, general manager of the Union Iron Works, has accepted the offer of a $10,000 wager by George Armes, president of the Moore Shipbuilding Co., that a gang of Moore riveters can beat any gang in the world. Tynan read of Armes's challenge while on his way West after a business trip to New York and Washington. From Julesburg, Colo., he sent the following telegram to San Francisco:

"I accept George Armes's challenge of $10,000 to be posted as a wager that a team from any department of the Moore Shipbuilding Co. can defeat any similar team from any other yard in the United States.

"J. J. TYNAN."

Armes, in issuing his challenge last week, criticized many claims to riveting prowess made throughout the East and in England, saying that investigation would show that the spectacular records were for "snap" riveting on inside water-tight work, and that competition with the countersunk, water-tight rivets, where it is necessary to calk the rivet with a flush die, would tell a different story. He believes he has some world-beating gangs. On the arrival of Tynan plans for the big sporting event probably will be concluded. It will be necessary to standardize the competition to insure a contest under as nearly as possible even conditions.

Chairman Hurley, of the Shipping Board, says—

Contests which cause men to overwork themselves for the sake of establishing new records, with the result that they are incapacitated for several days afterwards and the general system of the yard is demoralized, are to be discontinued. What we are trying to do is to encourage a spirit of sportsmanship that will stimulate all the men to do their best at all times.

I also quote from the San Francisco Bulletin the following figures as to the driving of rivets in a recent contest:

SATURDAY'S RECORD.

Schaw-Batcher: Brown, driving four hundred and thirty ¾-inch common head rivets in a shell in four hours; Kesler, second; Ventura, third.
Union Iron Works: Young, first, driving three hundred and twenty ¾-inch rivets in a keel in four hours; Beggs, second; Stewart, third.

I think it is important that all these facts should be made distinctly clear to this House. The charge has been made time and again that the unions have restricted the number of rivets to be driven to approximately 75 a day. These facts dispute it.

Mr. LOBECK. The gentleman, in the telegram that he read, spoke about gangs. Will he explain what a gang is?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. The gang consists of several men. There is only one man who drives the rivets, and he has several assistants.

Mr. LOBECK. If he drives 5,000 in a day, can he do that all alone?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Oh, no.

Mr. LOBECK. I thought he could, from the expressions I heard here.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman from Nebraska enlighten the House as to the action of Capt. Stayton in his district?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I had only three minutes, and I want to read some further testimony on this contest work, because the claims that have been made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] are not based upon the facts; therefore his contention that his motion should prevail is not sound.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] has four minutes remaining and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] four minutes.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist upon its disagreement. I do so because of the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy. He makes no objection to this. He says things are going along very satisfactorily, and to inject this question now might produce disturbances and cause friction when things are moving along pleasantly. Personally, I want to say that I see no objection to allowing labor to receive compensation for what it does. It seems to me men who accomplish much should receive more pay than men who accomplish little. That is my idea, personally.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. Is the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs aware of the fact that the wage rates established by the Wage-Adjustment Board have been put into effect in every navy yard in the country?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. And that if you have a different condition in the shipyards than you have in the navy yards it is going to disturb the working conditions?

Mr. PADGETT. I know that the Shipping Board have been raising wages so fast that we could hardly keep up with them. I will just give you an illustration.

Mr. NOLAN. Is it not a fact that the wage rates established by the shipyards have been put into effect in the navy yards?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; and I reported that in the conference report, and we had this illustration of it: When we had the bill before the House the committee reported a number of wage increases of the statutory men, because the per diem men doing the same kind of work had been raised by the Wage Board higher than the statutory men doing the same class of work and superior to them in rank. Before the bill got out of the Senate the Shipping Board raised the rate again, and the Senate raised it again, and the House agreed to it yesterday. That makes two raises of wages that have taken place on this present bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. No; I have not time now. Mr. Speaker, I want to say further that in moving to still further insist I am not influenced to do that by these telegrams. These telegrams were the hardest things I have had to get over to make this motion. They did not influence me to do it, and my interest in the matter was very much dampened by the fact that any such telegrams had been sent to Congress by any organization under conditions like those of the present. But under all the circumstances, in view of the recommendations of the Secretary of the Navy, I would be very glad if we can just allow existing law to continue and go along as we are moving along, very satisfactorily.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman does not think that telegram represents that organization, does he? Does he not think it is more the wording of the secretary than of the organization? The gentleman does not imagine that was ever submitted to the organization, does he?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know. I read the telegrams just as they came to me.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Has not the chairman of the committee received letters from employers of labor which were just about as vindicative as that telegram?

Mr. PADGETT. No; I have not.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Well, I have received a good many of them.

Mr. PADGETT. I think in this emergency, when Congress is confronted with the problems which are before us, the sending of a telegram to Congress threatening a strike if Congress sees fit to do a certain thing, is without justification. Notwithstanding that, in view of existing conditions and upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, and his statement that conditions are moving along pleasantly and nicely, and as this has been the existing law since 1915, I hope the House will still further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has four minutes remaining.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask not to be interrupted. It will be observed that if this amendment is adopted the question is left entirely in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy. He can pay a bonus if he thinks it necessary to win the war, or he can refuse to pay a bonus. This only gives him the opportunity of doing what practically every manufacturer in the United States does to-day, in paying bonuses to the labor of America to speed up production. In Great Britain the laboring men's unions have waived all restrictions, and finally Great Britain has enacted into law a provision that will permit speeding up. I quote from the index only because my time is so limited:

A. In general, all trade-unions shall submit to changes necessary for accelerating the output of war munitions or equipment.
B. In particular, they shall permit—
1. Unrestricted individual production.
2. Dilution of skilled labor by the introduction of female semi-skilled or unskilled labor.

The same legislative program went through in France. This is how labor of England and France view the situation. They will give up their union to win the war. Some people would reverse the situation in America.

Mr. Speaker, we have increased the price of wheat to $2.20 per bushel. We have increased the price of copper to 23½ cents a pound. We have increased the price of coal from 50 to 100 per cent. Was that done because the coal miner, the copper miner, and the farmer were not patriotic? No. It was on the theory that it was necessary in order to speed up, and to-day in order to speed up in the navy yards of the United States it is necessary that every laborer therein should do his best and that he should receive all he can earn. It is true that the Secretary of the Navy has made a statement in disapproval of this speeding-up plan. He says it is not necessary; but where does he get his information? Mr. Speaker, I say without fear of contradiction that there is not a man on the floor of this House but what would rather take the statement of the Chief of Ordnance in the Navy and the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks as to production than that of the Secretary of the Navy, because it is their business to know what it is costing them to produce and how best to get production. The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee, asked Admiral Earle, Chief of Ordnance:

That labor at $2 produced as much labor result as $4.40 now produces—that is, 8 hours' labor at $2 a day then produced as much product or result as a 10-hour day now produces at $4.40 a day?
Admiral EARLE. Yes.
Admiral PARKS. In many cases it produced more than the 10-hour day now produces. The efficiency is low.
The CHAIRMAN. That is certainly a sad comment.
Admiral PARKS. It is a terrible business, Mr. Chairman. It is the most serious thing in this country. It is the most serious thing in the war or anything else.

Admiral Parks, Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, gave similar testimony before the committee as late as May 29, 1918, as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. On the question of labor, how does the product as the result of the 10 hours of labor which costs you $4.40 compare with the 8 hours of labor for which you paid $1.60 before the war?
Admiral PARKS. All the information I have indicates that less useful work is secured for the $4.40 than was formerly secured for $1.60, and some have placed it as low as 65 per cent. The other thing is the increase in the cost of material. Power plants, of course, are operated out of this appropriation.
The CHAIRMAN. How much of the increase in the cost of labor and material has developed since the hearing in January? The hearing in January was on the basis of $7,000,000. The increase in labor, and so forth, has not taken place since January, has it?
Admiral PARKS. Yes, sir; twice; I should say 20 per cent since January, on the average.

Mr. Speaker, to put this provision into the law at this time is to say to the managers of every manufacturing plant in America who are paying a bonus that they are not patriotic to labor. By refusing to adopt the amendment you say to the Secretary of the Navy "You shall not speed up, you shall not pay labor anything extra for the extra labor that they can perform and are willing to perform in order to win the war."

Mr. Speaker, we should write this amendment prohibiting the payment of bonuses into the law. I know that union labor has been for it. I undertake to say that if a vote was had to-day by union labor, labor which is honest and patriotic would support the amendment I have offered. Union labor wants to win this war, and the only way to win it is to do all we can do, not only in the trenches in France but in the factories and in the navy yards and arsenals of the United States. We must have one policy for the Navy and Army, and that is to get the maximum of production. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to recede and concur in amendment 170.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KEATING and Mr. NOLAN) there were 50 ayes and 37 noes.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California makes the point of order that no quorum is present. Evidently there is not, and the Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 87, nays 205, answered "present" 1, not voting 137, as follows:

On the vote:

Mr. KEHOE (against) with Mr. GEORGE W. FAIRCHILD (for).

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to the following Members to extend their remarks in the RECORD upon amendment No. 170: Mr. GOOD, Mr. COX, Mr. CARY, Mr. SIEGEL, Mr. NOLAN, Mr. LANGLEY, Mr. KINKAID, Mr. GREEN of Iowa, and Mr. HULL of Iowa.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House still further insist upon its disagreement to the remaining amendments not heretofore acted upon. There are some immaterial and pro forma amendments not acted upon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House still further insist upon its disagreement to the rest of those amendments.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, what are they?

Mr. PADGETT. They do not involve anything; they depend upon those that we have already acted upon.

Mr. ROBBINS. To make the bill in harmony?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, is it necessary to put the motion to disagree to amendment No. 170?

The SPEAKER. No; the defeat of the motion to recede and concur is equivalent to a motion to still further insist on disagreement. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the remaining amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House ask for a further conference with the Senate upon the disagreements.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the House ask for a further conference. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

The Chair announced the following conferees: Mr. PADGETT, Mr. TALBOTT, Mr. RIORDAN, Mr. BUTLER, and Mr. BROWNING.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WATSON of Virginia indefinitely, on account of illness.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 12100) to amend the act approved September 7, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a United States Shipping Board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States; and for other purposes." This bill is on the Union Calendar, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to submit a request to call up the bill H. R. 11984, authorizing the fourteenth decennial census, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Census has reported a bill to take the fourteenth decennial census. It is quite obvious that in the immediate future a recess will be taken. This bill is a very important bill and must be passed at this session of Congress.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Why must it be passed at this session of Congress?

Mr. HELM. Because if this session of Congress expires without the passage of this bill it will have to go over until the next session, the short session, when, deducting about two weeks for a holiday, with all of the war legislation that will then be pressing and the annual appropriation bills it will be impossible to get the bill up for consideration.

Mr. GILLETT. Has it not generally been passed at that session?

Mr. HELM. No, sir. The next Congress convenes in December, 1919. Under this bill, and under any bill authorizing a decennial census, the work must begin six months ahead in order to permit the bureau to organize for taking the census. That is to say, the work of the census should begin not later than July 1, 1919. Now, if this legislation is postponed until the next Congress—the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress convenes in December, 1919—there would be only about two weeks, deducting holidays, before the decennial year begins, and it is of pressing and vital importance that the bill be passed without delay. I want to be agreeable; I do not want to obstruct anybody or be in anybody's way. I would be perfectly contented and satisfied if the House would agree that this bill should follow immediately after the consideration of the two bills which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] is going to present for consideration. I recognize the fact that this bill under the Constitution is, I believe if I were so disposed to press it, entitled to consideration over any other bill. It is a privileged bill and entitled to consideration, but I do not want to be in a position of obstructing other men who are interested in other bills.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, I do not agree with the gentleman that this bill should be made a privileged bill at this session of Congress; but if no action is taken at the present session of Congress, the President has authority to convene the next Congress in special session.

Mr. HELM. Call a special session for the purpose of passing a census bill? Absolutely preposterous.

Mr. WALSH. Then the bill can not be of the importance which the gentleman claims it to be at this session.

Mr. HELM. Do I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that he would have a special session of Congress convene for the purpose of passing a census bill that could be passed without any inconvenience to anybody at this session of Congress?

Mr. WALSH. I mean to say this, that if this measure is of the importance which the gentleman says it is under the Constitution, it certainly is of sufficient importance for a special session, and special sessions have been called upon many matters of less importance.

Mr. HELM. Supposing, making a violent assumption, that the gentleman were President of the United States——

Mr. WALSH. I want to say to the gentleman he should not make such an extremely violent assumption and turn a serious matter into a joke.

Mr. HELM (continuing). Would the gentleman convene a special session of Congress for the purpose of considering it?

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is quite right. I think there is no doubt on earth this is a question of the highest privilege under the Constitution.

Mr. HELM. There is not a particle of question about it, but I want to be reasonable——

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman, I suppose, could on the question of consideration, if the House was with him, take it up; but I think the gentleman's request is entirely reasonable, after the two bills from the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee are disposed of, in asking the House to make this the next order.

Mr. HELM. I ask unanimous consent, without waiving any rights or privilege status of the bill, but insisting on them, that after the consideration of the bills now proposed by the gentleman from Missouri, not to interfere with conference reports or appropriation bills, that this bill be taken up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the consideration of the two bills that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] has had made privileged that this census bill shall be taken up, not to interfere with conference reports or appropriation bills. Is there objection?

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, some more of us here have measures which we consider of importance, but we have been told they are not war measures, and if we expect action we had better go to the Rules Committee. Some of us took that advice as far back as last February, especially the committees that are interested in those measures. I take it the Committee on the Census ought to do the same thing, so I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California objects, and that is the end of it.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that at the conclusion of the consideration of the bills offered by the gentleman from Missouri that I propose to move to take up the census bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman gives notice that as soon as the two bills are out of the way he will attempt to get up the census bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. HELM. Well, I am going to raise the question of privilege, and I am going to pass it up to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will pass on it when he comes to it, but he is not going to pass on it now.

Mr. HELM. Well, I did not ask the Chair to pass on it now. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks that the bill H. R. 12100 be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill, and I do not think it should be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and therefore I object.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12100, and, pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be limited to one hour, one half to be controlled by myself and the other half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE]. I will say in this connection that when we get into consideration of the bill section by section it is not our purpose to insist on limitation of reasonable discussion of the sections as they come up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent, pending his motion, that general debate on this bill be limited to one hour——

Mr. ALEXANDER. And confined to the subject matter of the bill.

The SPEAKER. And confined to the subject matter of the bill, the time to be controlled half by the gentleman from Missouri and half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12100, with the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12100, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12100) to amend the act approved September 7, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a United States Shipping Board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States; and for other purposes."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] is recognized.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose at this time to go into a detailed explanation of the provisions of this bill. They will be explained in detail when we take it up under the five-minute rule section by section. That the two bills, H. R. 12100, the one now under consideration, and 12099, are of the utmost importance, is emphasized by the fact that they are essentially war measures. The bills were reported out of the committee on the 15th day of May. They are very different from the original bills which I introduced at the instance of the Shipping Board, and were entirely rewritten in the committee after the most thorough investigation and consideration. The report of the committee is unanimous, so that there is no difference of opinion in the committee about the policy of this legislation or as regards the necessity for it at this time.

On May 23 I received this letter from the President, which shows that he regards this proposed legislation of the utmost importance:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, May 23, 1918.

Hon. J. W. ALEXANDER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR JUDGE:

* * * * * * *

I am writing these lines chiefly to express my interest in the passage of H. R. 12100, increasing the powers of the United States Shipping Board, and H. R. 12099, empowering the President to regulate ocean-freight rates and to requisition vessels. I feel confident that the Congress will realize the capital importance of both these measures, but I am writing notwithstanding, in order that you may know my own constant interest in them.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

(Signed) WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. Hurley, chairman of the Shipping Board and president of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, writes me under the date of June 6 as follows:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, 6 June, 1918.

Hon. J. W. ALEXANDER,
Chairman Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR JUDGE ALEXANDER: Your committee has recently reported two bills—H. R. 12099 and H. R. 12100—conferring on the President and the Shipping Board additional powers over shipping, which we consider vital to our work of supplying ships for the prosecution of the war and of preserving the American merchant marine from foreign control.

We are in urgent need of this legislation and consider it of the greatest importance that the new powers contained in the bills be granted at the earliest possible moment.

For lack of adequate powers to control freight rates, shipowners are extorting freight charges which impose an unjust burden on American industry and on the Government of the United States and of the allies.

For lack of adequate power to control terminal facilities, charges for wharfage and dockage and storage have reached unconscionable heights, resulting in open and undisguised profiteering.

I am sure that your committee appreciates the importance of the legislation and feel that we can rely upon you to urge upon Congress the desirability of enacting it as soon as possible.

Cordially, yours,

EDWARD N. HURLEY, Chairman.

Under the date of June 11 Mr. Hurley also writes me as follows; and I will say by way of explanation that when these bills were considered in the committee the provision of H. R. 12099 to which he refers was stricken out by the committee. It was done at the suggestion of Mr. P. A. S. Franklin, who is one of the committee in control of shipping. His suggestion did not have my approval and did not have the approval of all the members of the committee, but we deferred to his judgment in the matter. After reconsideration by the committee, we unanimously decided to restore the provision to the bill, and at the proper time I will offer an amendment restoring the provision to H. R. 12099. I am presenting this letter at this time that you may get the attitude of Mr. Hurley toward this legislation. These bills, H. R. 12100 and H. R. 12099 are regarded by the committee of great importance as war measures, and we have asked that the consideration of one shall follow the consideration of the other. He says:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
WASHINGTON, June 11, 1918.

Hon. J. W. ALEXANDER,
Chairman Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR JUDGE ALEXANDER: I wonder if it would be possible for your committee to put back in the rate-regulation bill, which you have recently reported, the section authorizing the President to regulate rates and charges for wharfage, dockage, stevedoring, etc.?

This section was eliminated, I am informed, because it was feared that the practical difficulties of regulating charges of this character would be too serious to overcome. Recent investigation, however, has impressed us so strongly with the seriousness of the problem of high charges of this character that we feel that it is our duty to try to regulate them if Congress will give us the power. Wharfage rates have increased in some cases more than fivefold.

I hope that it will be possible, without delaying the bill, to restore this section.

Yours, very truly, EDWARD N. HURLEY,
Chairman.

Now, if I had the time I would explain just in what respects we amend the shipping act under the provisions of H. R. 12100. Section 2 of the shipping act is amended by adding at the end of the first paragraph a provision the purpose of which is to further safeguard our Government and insure the control of ships being built in American shipyards, to prevent foreign interests, under any sort of device or contract or trust agreement, to get control of our shipping. The same is true as regards our shipyards. The committee were impressed with the importance of so hedging these great interests with legislation that all the resources of this country might be utilized and made effective in the building of ships and retaining to ourselves the control of all our great shipbuilding interests. In other words, during this crisis, when one of the great problems confronting us is to build ships quickly and in large numbers and make them available to transport our troops and supplies and munitions to Europe, provide food and munitions of war for our allies, it should be placed beyond the power of any foreign government to hamper us or get control in any way of our ships or of our shipbuilding industries.

I assume that our allies, with whom we are in entire accord and are cooperating, would not undertake to do this. But we do know there are influences, inspired by alien enemies, that would hamper us and, if possible, get control of our shipping and of our shipbuilding industries not only to cripple us now but with a view of restoring their losses of shipping after the war is over. It is the opinion of the committee, as it is the opinion of the Shipping Board, that any possible action of that kind should be prevented, and this bill is framed with that end in view.

Now, section 9 of the shipping act of September 16, 1916——

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will.

Mr. CANNON. Is this a war measure?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes, sir; and most of the provisions are limited to the period of the war.

Mr. CANNON. I think it is important that the House should know what portions are going to be permanent law.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If I get the time, when we come to the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule, I will undertake to make that very clear.

Mr. HARDY. I suggest to the gentleman that he look on page 5, section 37.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will do no more now than refer to the provision to which my attention has been called. If you turn to section 4, page 5, you will note this provision:

That said act is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof eight sections, as follows:

"SEC. 37. That when the United States is at war or during any national emergency, the existence of which is declared by proclamation of the President, it shall be unlawful, without first obtaining the approval of the board"—

To do any of the things that are specifically enumerated and prohibited. I will not take the time now to point out just what those are, as I do not wish to consume any more time just now. I reserve the balance of my time and hope later to explain any question that may be asked.

At this point I will incorporate as part of my remarks my report on the bill, which explains the bill very fully and makes clear the necessity for this legislation:

Mr. ALEXANDER, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12100) to amend the act approved September 7, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a United States Shipping Board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States; and for other purposes," having considered the same, report it to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Section 9 of the shipping act of September 7, 1916, makes it unlawful, during a period of war or emergency, without the approval of the Shipping Board, to sell to a foreigner or transfer to a foreign flag any vessel registered or licensed and enrolled under the laws of the United States. The present bill is designed to perfect and extend this provision, by amendment and by the addition of further sections, to supply defects and to meet practical difficulties of administration which over a year's experience under the shipping act has revealed. The new legislation is rendered necessary by the dearth of tonnage created by the unrestricted submarine warfare of the Imperial German Government. As a consequence of this shortage, there has been during the past two years a systematic, determined, and resourceful effort on the part of foreign financial interests to buy up and take from under the American flag the vessels of the American merchant marine. Prices have been tendered which before the war would have seemed beyond the dreams of avarice. Every type of vessel, from schooner to ocean liner, has been coveted. Most American shipowners, to their great credit, have resisted these tempting offers. Others have found their efforts frustrated by the Shipping Board. A small minority of shipowners, however, have attempted by every device which legal ingenuity could suggest to evade the provisions of the President's proclamation. It is to meet the efforts of this small minority that the present bill has been drafted. It is also designed to give to the Shipping Board a more complete control over construction of vessels for foreign account and purchase of American shipyards by foreigners.

The bill is a war measure and, excepting a few provisions which will be specially referred to in this report, its effect is restricted to periods of war or emergency.

Section 1 of the bill adds to section 1 of the shipping act, containing definitions of terms, two additional definitions. The term "vessel" is defined as at present in the Revised Statutes (Title 1, ch. 1), except that it is specifically made to include hulls in course of construction, thus extending the prohibition against foreign sales to ships building in American yards. In the absence of such a provision, a hull in course of construction does not become a "vessel" until launched. (Tucker v. Alexandroff, 183 U. S., 424.) The term "documented under the laws of the United States" is defined to mean "registered, enrolled, or licensed under the laws of the United States." The effect of this definition is to bring under the act vessels licensed but not enrolled (i. e., ships under 20 tons). In view of the military value of even small vessels, this change is considered important.

Section 2 of the bill amends section 2 of the shipping act by setting forth more in detail under what circumstances a corporation is deemed to be a citizen of the United States within the meaning of the act. Under the present law a corporation, partnership, or association is not a "citizen" unless "the controlling interest therein is owned by citizens of the United States." This phrase has been elaborated to include every possible device by which foreign interests could obtain control in law or fact over corporations formed under American law.

Section 3 amends section 9 of the shipping act as follows:

To the first paragraph of the section, which provides that vessels sold, leased, or chartered to a citizen of the United States under the shipping act may engage in coastwise trade, there are added the words "while owned, leased, or chartered by such a person." The effect of this is to make certain that vessels sold, leased, or chartered from the board shall be entitled to the coastwise privilege only as long as the person owning, leasing, or chartering them remains a citizen of the United States. This is permanent legislation and is designed to express more clearly the intent of the original shipping act and guard against possible misconstruction.

The second paragraph is retained without alteration.

In the third paragraph, the first sentence, prohibiting transfers or sales to foreigners in time of war or emergency without the Shipping Board's consent, is taken out, since the substance of it, in greatly extended form, appears in later sections. In the second clause (which is operative at all times, in war or peace), forbidding sales or transfers of vessels of American ownership or flag without a prior tender to the Shipping Board, the words "documented under the laws of the United States" are used, in conformity with the new definition in section 1, and the paragraph is made applicable not only to vessels owned by citizens of the United States, but to vessels owned by corporations organized under American laws, but which, by virtue of the definition in section 2, are not citizens of the United States.

The next paragraph, containing penalties, is amended to include vessels "placed under" foreign registry, as well as those "transferred" to foreign registry, to cover vessels of American ownership, but which had not yet received American documentation.

Section 4 of the new bill adds to the shipping act eight new sections, numbered from 37 to 44, inclusive, which will take the place of the clause in paragraph 3, section 9, of the shipping act, eliminated by the present amendment. As was the case with the clause which they replace, the new sections, except as hereafter indicated, are operative only in times of war or emergency.

Section 37 extends existing prohibitions in time of war or emergency in the following respects:

The words "transfer to" foreign registry are supplemented by the words "placed under" foreign registry, for the reasons above set forth with respect to section 9. Vessels owned by corporations not American citizens are included in the prohibition for reasons already indicated.

Not only sales and charters to foreigners, but mortgages to foreigners, without the consent of the Shipping Board, are made unlawful. This is because a mortgage has proved to be a common device by which foreign capital has sought to obtain control of American vessels.

Besides vessels, the section is made applicable to "any shipyard, dry dock, shipbuilding or ship-repairing plant or facilities, or any interest therein." Under present war conditions shipbuilding has become of such vital national concern that foreign control is as much to be avoided as is foreign control of American shipping.

Agreements or understandings transferring to foreigners stock control of corporations owning American ships, dry docks, and shipyards are made unlawful, to prevent evasion of the act by formation of dummy corporations.

Finally, it is declared to be unlawful to make any contract to build a ship for foreign account, except with the consent of the Shipping Board, or to procure any vessel built in the United States to depart from the United States except under American documentation. This paragraph enacts the principle that in war time the output of American shipyards, embodying American labor and resources, must serve the world's commerce and the needs of the war under the American flag.

Appropriate penal provisions are contained in this section, and any sale, mortgage, lease, transfer, documentation, or agreement in violation of the section is declared to be void. It is expressly provided that consideration paid under such a void transaction shall be recoverable. This will be a strong deterrent to shipowners who might otherwise hope that they could throw the burden of forfeiture proceedings on the purchaser, while themselves retaining the proceeds of the sale.

Section 38 prescribes the method of prosecuting forfeitures, bringing it into uniformity with the practice under the customs laws and the navigation laws. This section is applicable to all forfeitures under the act, in normal times as well as in times of war or emergency.

Section 39 provides that conviction in a criminal prosecution under the act shall be prima facie evidence in a proceeding for forfeiture. This will facilitate enforcement of the act, while preserving to the parties concerned their full constitutional rights.

Section 40 further facilitates the practical enforcement of the new provisions by requiring a declaration to be filed with all bills of sale, mortgages, hypothecations, or conveyances recorded with collectors of customs, setting forth the facts relating to the citizenship of the vendee, mortgagee, or transferee; and a heavy penalty is provided for any person who knowingly makes a material false statement in such declaration. This section will call to the attention of shipowners and their brokers and attorneys the prohibitions of the law, and will make it easier to nip in the bud any attempted violation. In its phraseology the section follows the language of the present Federal recording act (R. S., 4192), except that until the statement is filed the transaction is declared to be invalid against any person whatsoever. Under existing law, unrecorded instruments of this character are invalid against "any person other than the grantor or mortgagor, his heirs and devisees, and persons having actual notice thereof." This modification is necessary to effectuate the purpose of absolutely preventing sales, mortgages, or conveyances to persons whose citizenship is not certified to.

Section 41 makes it possible to grant approval to sales, transfers, or other transactions on condition. It often happens that the sale of a vessel, perhaps specially appropriate to a particular foreign service essential to the war, is deemed advisable, provided the purchaser makes certain undertakings regarding the use of the vessel and the control of its movements. As the law now stands it is not certain that a violation of such an undertaking is punishable. There is some danger that the purchaser may obtain the Shipping Board's consent by agreeing to conditions and after he has secured the vessel repudiate the conditions. The section, in effect, provides that violation of such a condition shall nullify the approval and render the transaction punishable as though no approval had been granted.

The second paragraph to this section makes it unlawful to knowingly make a false statement of a material fact to secure the approval of a transaction required to be approved by the act. This is permanent legislation which will have a wholesome effect on the conduct of business before the Shipping Board.

Section 42 provides that a vessel registered, enrolled, or licensed under the laws of the United States shall be deemed to continue to be documented under the laws of the United States within the meaning of section 37 until surrender of its documentation has been approved by the Shipping Board. This is to make certain that the owner of a vessel can not evade the law by procuring a cancellation of his register or enrollment, thus under a possible construction of the present shipping act freeing himself from some of its restraints.

Section 43 requires a proclamation of the President to indicate that the period of war or emergency has ended.

Section 44 gives a short title, for convenient reference, to the shipping act of September 6, 1916. Section 5 of the amending act gives a short title to the present bill.

The bill reported herewith is considered an essential measure for the preservation of an American merchant marine. It has the unanimous support of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] is recognized.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to occupy any time at present on this bill. The purpose of the bill has been explained by the chairman, and there was no disagreement in the committee as to the necessity of the legislation. The committee carefully considered the bill item by item, and they believe that they present a bill which fully protect the rights of American shipbuilders and American shipowners and amply protect the rights of the Government. During the hearings testimony was presented showing that attempts had been made to interfere with the work of upbuilding an American merchant marine and it was forcibly intimated to the committee that there was danger that some of the representatives of foreign governments that are engaged against us in war would not hesitate to make some attempt to control our shipbuilding interests, and also, by purchase or other acts, obtain stock in the various vessels that the Shipping Board and private enterprise might construct, such alien enemies might control the management of the vessels or in the event of corporations being formed they might become controlling factors in such corporations. The committee have given these features careful consideration and have endeavored in this bill to amply protect every interest against the machinations of all our enemies, foreign and domestic.

The report upon the bill is very explicit and gives full information of the reasons for the legislation.

The experiences which have clearly demonstrated the need of the proposed legislation since the declaration of war fully justify the action of the committee in presenting this bill.

As there is but a limited time allotted for general debate, I will conclude my remarks and yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY], a member of the committee.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, I believe with the chairman of the committee that the bill will be better followed if the detailed explanations so frequently made of a bill are made in the course of consideration under the five-minute rule. However, there are some of the primary features of the bill to which I wish to call attention by way of explaining the purpose and effect of the measure as proposed. My statement will be directed to those purposes only, leaving the other amendments to consideration in the course of the procedure under the five-minute rule.

Like all ordinary general legislation in days of peace the act creating the Shipping Board was made permanent law, and in the main was adapted to normal conditions. While it anticipated the possibility of war or national emergency, and contained certain provisions applicable thereto, in the very nature of things it could not reasonably be expected that all emergency conditions would have been adequately provided for in that act. In the light of its experience under the operation of the law, the Shipping Board has asked for amendatory legislation embodying substantially the provisions of this bill. It has been modified and rewritten so as to express the composite judgment of the committee.

I support it because it will conserve American tonnage to America. In this hour, when with all the allied nations we wait with anxiety for the actual addition to our merchant marine of the tonnage now building, it would be the part of utmost folly, it would be suicidal, in fact, to permit the possibility of alienation of any portion of it during the war to those not citizens of the United States, without the approval of the Shipping Board. Under existing law some of the avenues of transfer are securely barred, but not all. It is with a view to barring every unapproved means of transfer and every objectionable avenue of escape, that a portion of section 37 is now proposed as an addition to the original act, it being a part of section 4 of the pending bill. With the prohibition against transfers of vessels there is also coupled a like prohibition against the sale or transfer of "any shipyard, dry dock, shipbuilding, or ship-repairing plant or facilities, or any interest therein."

Will anyone say that while the country is at war it is entirely safe to leave all these, or any of them, open to the negotiation, acquisition, or control of aliens without any outstanding power to approve or prevent it? In the absence of this amendment I know of no express provision of law whereby anyone may lawfully interfere to restrain the consummation of transactions of such doubtful business policy and potential menace.

During the period of the war the control of transfers is no more vital than the control of contracts.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. I would like to make this statement, and then I will be glad to yield to the gentleman if I have the time.

No one will question for a moment that the right to contract for the construction of a vessel within the United States to be delivered to an alien during the war, without the approval of the board, ought to be absolutely prohibited. Some may contend that the right to so contract during the war for such construction and delivery after the war ought to be permitted. Speaking for myself, I am not willing to contribute in any manner or in any degree to the possibility of the control of American shipyards for foreign account after the war, at the very moment when through the exigencies of war their full capacity may be of imminent necessity for the rehabilitation and expansion of the American merchant marine. If by good fortune it shall develop at the close of the war that our tonnage is such that some portion of our facilities might have been safely and remuneratively employed in the construction of vessels for aliens immediately following the war, it will be far better to sustain any possible temporary disadvantage or loss from that source, as the penalty of reasonable prudence now, than through reckless improvidence to expose the country to possible contingencies which can not now be foreseen, but which may be freighted with consequences far more untoward and hazardous. Upon this theory of good policy the bill carries the provision:

That when the United States is at war or during any national emergency, the existence of which is declared by proclamation of the President, it shall be unlawful, without first obtaining the approval of the board, * * * to enter into any contract, agreement, or understanding to construct a vessel within the United States for or to be delivered to any person not a citizen of the United States.

This is a limitation upon the right of contract which the law does not now contain, but one which I shall cheerfully support as a wise precaution during the period of war, and a limitation the exercise of which we may well rest in the jurisdiction and control and in the sound discretion of the Shipping Board.

It is also proposed to amend the shipping act in a further material and essential particular as follows:

Section 2 of that act provides that—

No corporation, partnership, or association shall be deemed a citizen of the United States unless the controlling interest therein is owned by citizens of the United States, and, in the case of a corporation, unless its president and managing directors are citizens of the United States and the corporation itself is organized under the laws of the United States or of a State, Territory, District, or possession thereof.

Under the operation of the law it is thought that that language may not be sufficiently restrictive to defeat all possibility of control of American corporations by foreign interests. In order to effect that result the language of section 2 of the bill is employed as an addition or supplement to that portion of section 2 of the existing law just cited.

The following is the amendatory provision:

The controlling interest in a corporation shall not be deemed to be owned by citizens of the United States (a) if the title to a majority of the stock thereof is not vested in such citizens free from any trust or fiduciary obligation in favor of any person not a citizen of the United States; or (b) if the majority of the voting power in such corporation is not vested in citizens of the United States; or (c) if through any contract or understanding it is so arranged that the majority of the voting power may be exercised, directly or indirectly, in behalf of any person who is not a citizen of the United States; or (d) if by any other means whatsoever control of the corporation is conferred upon or permitted to be exercised by any person who is not a citizen of the United States.

That is proposed as permanent law.

In addition to this, the bill contains a temporary provision in subdivision (d) of the new section 37, which is limited to the duration of the war, conditioned that it shall be unlawful without first obtaining the approval of the board—

(d) To make any agreement or effect any understanding whereby there is vested in or for the benefit of any person not a citizen of the United States the controlling interest or a majority of the voting power in a corporation which is organized under the laws of the United States, or of any State, Territory, District, or possession thereof, and which owns any vessel, shipyard, dry dock, or shipbuilding or ship-repairing plant or facilities.

There are a number of other important amendments, but it is not my purpose to discuss them in general debate. I have only said this much with respect to the points touched upon to emphasize the fact that this is legislation of an emergency character which ought to be speedily enacted in the interest of our merchant marine, in the interest of the successful prosecution of the war, and in the interest of our gallant soldiers and sailors to whom we owe not only unlimited support but every protection which prudence and foresight can provide. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I am very much interested in the statement that the gentleman has made, which so fully sets forth the purposes of this bill and in such a clear manner. But I wanted to ask the gentleman what other public emergencies did the committee have in mind in framing this amendment whereby they provide that in case of war "or during any national emergency" certain things shall be unlawful. What sort of emergencies did the committee have in mind outside of war?

Mr. HADLEY. The gentleman refers to section 37, "that when the United States is at war or during any national emergency * * * it shall be unlawful," and so forth?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HADLEY. That is language contained in the existing law.

Mr. WALSH. Was not that carried earlier in the measure, that same language?

Mr. HADLEY. I think not.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is the language of section 9 of the shipping act. It has been transferred to section 37.

Mr. WALSH. That is just reincorporated in section 37?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. What kind of emergencies would that cover?

Mr. ALEXANDER rose.

Mr. HADLEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri to answer; I will be glad to.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It might include an acute situation in which we were short of shipping in our foreign commerce. It might be when foreign nations were at war, and it could be like that situation which ensued after August 1, 1914.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. HADLEY. That language was contained in the existing law, an act passed in time of peace, without reference to the existing war, but contemplating at that time the possibility of emergencies which I shall not now discuss, because we are not now discussing conditions that existed at the time the shipping act was passed. But it is now part of the new section, and is carried on as existing law on which this act is based.

Mr. WALSH. And is it true that this act as amended will apply during the present war, and that when peace comes certain of its provisions will terminate and not become effective again until there is war or a national emergency?

Mr. HADLEY. That is true; and in fact all the principal provisions to which I have referred will so terminate, except where the language in the permanent law is now amended with respect to the controlling interest of foreign corporations. That is permanent law. Others are not so material as that which I have explained.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Washington if the prohibition contained in subdivision (a) of section 2 does not amount in effect to a prohibition of the holding of stock by any alien? The only way of securing that a majority of the stock should be vested in citizens of the United States would be to destroy the negotiability of the individual share of stock.

Mr. HADLEY. The language to which the gentleman refers——

Mr. LONDON. That is on page 2, line 20 and following.

Mr. HADLEY. "If the title to a majority of the stock thereof is not vested in such citizens free from any trust or fiduciary obligation in favor of any person not a citizen of the United States," in that event the controlling interest would not be contemplated to be owned by a citizen of the United States unless the condition exists.

Mr. LONDON. It seems to me the section accomplishes this, that the entire stock will have to be owned and controlled, because the individual purchaser of stock will not be in a position to know whether his share, along with other shares, will not constitute a majority in the nature of foreign holdings. Is not that the effect of it?

Mr. HADLEY. That is a question of fact that will be determined in the transfers of stock. The point we seek to make is that the controlling interest shall not pass out of the hands of our citizens.

Mr. LONDON. I am not opposed to it, but it practically destroys the negotiability of the individual stock.

Mr. HADLEY. I think when the transactions are frank and open there will be no hesitation on the part of those in control of the corporate books to indicate the situation as to existing transfers, so that a purchaser may understand it as it may exist.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has again expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe anyone on this side cares to take time. I will yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY] five minutes more if he wants it.

Mr. ROBBINS. I want to ask the gentleman from Washington a question.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HUMPHREYS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution and bill of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 255. Joint resolution authorizing the readmission to the United States of certain aliens who have been conscripted or have volunteered for service with the military forces of the United States or cobelligerent forces; and

H. R. 8563. An act to amend the homestead law in its application to Alaska, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 4482) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROBBINS. What I conceive to be a very important feature of this bill, Mr. Chairman, is that provision by which they seek to prevent the control of a shipping company, or a ship even, under section 2 from passing into foreign hands. As I understand this section and the explanation that the gentleman gave of it, it relates only to the majority interest of the stock of the company. The minority may be held by foreigners. This inhibition only works against the majority control of the stock which controls the company. If this company owns ships how are you going to enforce that provision? There is no provision in this bill that works a forfeiture of the charter. There is no provision here that renders null and void the transfer of the stock.

For instance, take the American Merchant Marine, that is an American corporation. Suppose it has 100,000 shares of stock and 49,900 shares are held abroad. That would still leave the control in the United States, in citizens of this country. How are you going to prevent the small amount of stock to pass control from being transferred into another corporation?

Mr. HADLEY. I think the gentleman will find, when we come to read the bill under the five-minute rule, that there are provisions of forfeiture carried in it that will probably answer the question with sufficient definiteness. Sections 38 and 39 deal with the subject of forfeitures, and section 39 reads:

That in any action or proceeding under the provisions of this act to enforce the forfeiture of any vessel or interest therein or of any stocks, bonds, or any other securities, the conviction in a court of criminal jurisdiction of any person for a violation thereof with respect to such vessel or to such stocks, bonds, or other securities, shall constitute prima facie evidence of such violation against the person so convicted.

Mr. ROBBINS. I noticed that, and it does not strike me as going to the extent to which this provision ought to go. Of course, there is a penal provision on page 6, under clause (e), which provides for a fine or imprisonment, but that does not meet the proposition. You must have some remedy here for the forfeiture of the stock clearly provided. Otherwise your statute will be nugatory and impossible of enforcement, and if you are going to preserve these ships in American registry, then you must have some method in this act of stopping this transfer. Otherwise your act will not be enforcible.

Mr. EDMONDS. If the gentleman will yield, I should like to call his attention to the fact that the only time when this controlling interest would be of vital importance would be that referred to in section 37, which prevents the transfer during the time of war of the controlling interest in a company, either in the stock or in the ships to a foreign party. Now, such being the case, in that section 37 there is carried a forfeiture of stock and in some cases of ships.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I think the difficulties suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] will resolve themselves if he will look to that section of the original act to which this particular section of our bill is an amendment.

Mr. ROBBINS. I have that act before me.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. If the gentleman will look at section 2, he will see—

That within the meaning of this act no corporation, partnership, or association shall be deemed a citizen of the United States unless the controlling interest therein is owned by citizens of the United States and the corporation itself is organized under the laws of the United States or of a State, Territory, District, or possession thereof.

In that act certain rights are afforded to citizens of the United States, and this amendment further defines the circumstances under which a corporation, partnership, or association shall not be deemed to be a citizen of the United States, and if they are not citizens, then they will not be within the benefits of the act. The amendment intends to make it impossible for any arrangement to be effected by which such a corporation, partnership, or association shall be a citizen of the United States, when the real control of same is in the hands of aliens. We have sought to make the language used so sweeping and comprehensive that no lawyer, however ingenious, would be able to work out any device under this section to keep the letter, while breaking the spirit of the law.

Mr. ROBBINS. Of course, it operates on the majority holders.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes. As far as the minority holders are concerned, we do not concern ourselves about them. The majority control must be in the hands of citizens of the United States. We do not care about the minority members.

Mr. ROBBINS. And it renders the majority holdings non-negotiable.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That may be true.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BURROUGHS].

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Chairman, I heartily favor the bill under consideration. As the chairman of the committee stated a moment ago, there is no difference of opinion among its members as to the expediency or the necessity of this legislation at this time. The prime purpose of this bill is to make it impossible, at least during the war, to transfer ships that we are now constructing at great expense to a foreign flag. We wish to safeguard and secure under American control these ships that we are now building to meet this emergency. We should not permit by any means, directly or indirectly, any of this tonnage or any interest in it to pass out of our control, at least until the war is over. I regard its passage as vitally important at this particular time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield in that particular?

Mr. BURROUGHS. Yes; for a question.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume that in the consideration of this bill concrete instances were furnished to the committee showing the necessity of some such legislation. Will the gentleman kindly communicate some of these cases?

Mr. BURROUGHS. I do not have particular cases in mind, but if the gentleman will read the hearings he will get all the testimony that was presented to the committee. The hearings have been printed for distribution.

Mr. STAFFORD. I know the gentleman has attended the hearings before the committee.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I did attend them, but I do not happen to have a copy of the hearings before me.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not care to embarrass the gentleman.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I am not sure that concrete instances were cited in the testimony, but it certainly was stated upon the authority of the witnesses who appeared before the committee that there had been an effort to circumvent the evident purpose of the shipping act and transfer ships or hulls of ships in various stages of completion from American to foreign ownership. Representatives of the Shipping Board made these statements, as I recollect, and cited the fact that particular inducements had been offered in some instances in order to get control of our shipping interests.

The necessity of this legislation is grounded in the fact that there is to-day in the world a shortage of tonnage due to the great losses from the submarine.

At present there seems to be a widespread feeling, based in part on encouraging statements by our naval authorities, that the submarine peril is passing, if in fact it has not already passed. I sincerely and earnestly hope it is passing; but I am disposed to look the facts, very ugly though they may be, squarely in the face. What are the facts?

The submarine has been, if indeed it is not yet, the deadliest weapon of the war. All the artillery, all the infantry, all the battleships, all the millions of tons of explosives and projectiles the Germans have shot into the air have not inflicted the damage nor cost the allies so dear as a few hundred of these undersea boats. They have destroyed or crippled or kept in harbor more than one-half the ocean-going tonnage of the whole world. By forcing a convoy system, devious routes, and no lights, they have cut down the effectiveness of what remains nearly one-half more. They have destroyed more tonnage than all the allies, including the United States, can probably rebuild in the next two years. They have prevented and still prevent effective aid to Russia. They are still sinking more ocean-going tonnage than all the yards of the world were building before the war.

As bearing out what I have stated, according to monthly statements of the British Admiralty, the submarine losses in 1917 amounted to approximately 6,620,000 gross tons, the equivalent of more than 10,000,000 tons dead-weight. For the quarter ending March 31, 1918, according to the same authority, the loss was 1,123,510 gross tons, or 1,685,265 tons dead-weight. This refers to British and allied losses. French Admiralty figures for April, 1918, show losses of 381,631 tons gross, making a total for one-third of 1918 of 1,505,141 tons gross, equivalent to 2,257,711 tons dead-weight.

At this rate, submarine losses in 1918 will be close to 7,000,000 tons dead-weight. While these figures would show a reduction in the total losses from sinkings for the year of 3,000,000 tons over losses in 1917, they are still, in my opinion, sufficiently large to cause concern. While it is possible and perhaps likely that these losses may be reduced, we must not blink the fact that it is also possible that they may be at any time greatly increased.

I append the following table compiled from monthly statements of the British Admiralty:

Losses by submarine.

Quarter ending—	British.	Allied nations.
March, 1917	911,840	1,619,373
January, 1917	1,361,370	2,236,934
September, 1917	952,938	1,494,473
December, 1917	782,880	1,272,843
Total	4,009,028	6,623,623
March, 1918	687,576	1,123,510

It should be borne in mind that these figures represent gross tonnage according to the British method of measurements. In order to get their equivalent in dead-weight tonnage, which is the usual standard in which American tonnage is expressed, these amounts should be multiplied by 1.6.

Now, in view of this peril, which, as it would seem from the figures above quoted, is by no means at an end, but, on the contrary, still constitutes a very real menace to the success of the allied cause, it must be apparent to all that every possible precaution should be taken to safeguard our tonnage against the shortage occasioned by the submarine. The problem as it presents itself to us has been well stated by Mr. Arthur H. Pollen, England's distinguished naval critic. In September last, in an article published in the New York Tribune, Mr. Pollen used the following language:

If the United States of America is to maintain an army of 1,000,000 men on French soil, it is a conservative estimate to suppose that each man will need at a minimum 4 tons of shipping and may need 5. I don't know what tonnage will be called for to take over 25,000 aircraft, the proposed contribution of raw material, and the extra food which the people of America are to deny themselves for the sake of their fellow fighters in Europe. But clearly if the position in Europe is to be improved by a larger number of men, increased supplies of munitions, a greater reserve of food, and a more numerous force for fighting in the air, it is by shipping and by no other means that these benefits are to accrue to us.

American intervention, then, calls for more shipping, and at the time of writing it is vanishing at a net rate of at least 500,000 tons a month. By February, 1918, the total stock of shipping will be between thirty-three and thirty-four millions tons; a year later it will be twenty-eight or twenty-nine millions tons.

Allowing only 5,000,000 tons for the purely military requirements of the United States, there will be available for the general purposes of the allies, therefore, 29,000,000 tons at the beginning of 1918 and 24,000,000 a year later.

Can the allies carry on the war when their over-sea supplies are limited to this extent? This depends, of course, to a great extent on the amount of food that can be raised by the abnormal efforts of Great Britain and France during this and next year. It depends, too, upon improved methods of unloading and loading ships so that each vessel may do more journeys in a given time.

Finally, it depends upon the extent to which the allied peoples in Europe can limit their consumption of food, either voluntarily or by the enforced order of the State. There are too many unknown factors for it to be possible to say exactly what is the minimum shipping that will see us through.

But it is quite obvious that there must be a certain level that may be called the vanishing point.

It is the object of the whole German submarine campaign to bring the world's shipping to this point at the earliest possible moment. It represents the only hope the German high command can entertain for avoiding a final military defeat.

At the present moment, Mr. Chairman, the loss of tonnage due to submarine depredations has not been replaced. Indeed, in spite of all the efforts of all the allied nations combined, the total net loss has largely increased since Mr. Pollen wrote the words I have quoted. To offset the 1917 losses the total new construction in all yards of the United Kingdom amounted approximately to 1,800,000 dead-weight tons, while America was able to place in service in the same year less than 700,000 tons, making a total of about 2,500,000 tons placed in commission in 1917 as against a loss of upwards of 10,000,000 tons in that year. Thus rapidly, Mr. Chairman, we were approaching what Mr. Pollen terms the "vanishing point" at the beginning of the present year.

Since January 1, 1918, the records of the United States Bureau of Navigation and official returns in the United Kingdom show new tonnage completed, as follows:

Tonnage completed.

Month.	United States.	United Kingdom.
1918.	Tons.	Tons.
January	91,541	87,852
February	123,100	150,075
March	166,700	252,511
April	240,000	169,000
May	260,000	.....
Totals	881,341	659,438

From the foregoing figures it will be seen that in the first three months of this year the total construction in this country and in the United Kingdom amounted to 871,779 dead-weight tons to offset a loss during this first quarter of the year amounting to 1,685,265 tons.

This brings me to a discussion of what we may reasonably expect in the way of new construction in 1918. If Great Britain maintains the same rate of progress for the balance of this year as in the first four months, she will construct and place in service during 1918 about 2,000,000 dead-weight tons. If she does this, she will have attained as high a mark in ship construction as she has ever reached in all her history. Indeed, it is more than likely that she will fall short of this total production for the year, particularly as she is short of labor, is understood to be delayed for steel plates, and is depending upon the United States for portions of her steel plate, which we are now with difficulty delivering in sufficient quantity to our own shipyards.

How about America? Evidence before the Commerce Committee of the Senate in its recent investigation would seem to indicate that the maximum output of steel and wooden shipping in the United States for this critical year of 1918 will not greatly exceed 3,000,000 tons. Mr. J. W. Powell, vice president, in charge of shipbuilding for the Bethlehem Corporation, comprising several large shipbuilding plants and understood to hold contracts for nearly one-third of our ship program, in testifying before the Senate committee said:

I am sure that in 1918, with the various handicaps we are going up against, if the country turns out 3,000,000 tons it will be a very wonderful performance.

Such, in substance, was also the testimony of Mr. Homer L. Ferguson, president of the Newport News Co., and one of our best and most experienced shipping authorities. Mr. Ferguson thought it would be the end of 1919 before we would be able to expand our shipping construction to a rate of 5,000,000 tons a year. Mr. Hurley, chairman of the Shipping Board, a few days ago stated what was his opinion and also that of Mr. Schwab, Director General of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, that the expert estimate of 3,000,000 tons for this year can be exceeded; but he gave no estimate of his own or any figures further than to say that before this year closes we shall be turning out a half million tons each month. The figures for May, which I have already quoted, are but little more than half this amount.

When we consider, as we should in this connection, our present inadequate railroad facilities, our difficulties in maintaining deliveries of steel, engines, boilers, turbines, and other necessary equipment for only 2,000,000 tons of steel ships per annum, not to mention the practical obstacles of lack of timber, lack of skilled shipping labor, and lack of steel and wooden ship building management, we may, indeed, think ourselves very fortunate if we succeed in adding a total of 3,000,000 tons to the world's shipping in 1918. Submarine losses since April 1 last are not definitely known, since the figures are not yet available. It is believed, however, that when issued they will show a considerable decrease over those last published. If they amount to anything like 7,000,000 tons for the year 1918, as the figures I have already given would seem to indicate, is it not apparent that with Great Britain building only 2,000,000 tons and America 3,000,000 tons in 1918 the peril of the submarine is still with us? We must not forget either that last year the British comptroller of shipping, Sir Joseph Maclay, announced that the United States must be depended upon for 6,000,000 tons of new shipping each year to offset the ravages of the submarine, and Sir Joseph was talking of "gross weight"; if he had used our term of "dead-weight" tons, his figures would have been over 9,000,000 instead of 6,000,000.

Mr. Hurley has recently stated that by the end of 1920 the Shipping Board will have given us 25,000,000 tons.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURROUGHS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the program of the United States was to build 28,000,000 tons of shipping?

Mr. BURROUGHS. What I said was that I understood the chairman of the Shipping Board had recently stated that by 1920 he expected to have 25,000,000 tons of shipping.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I read some time ago that there are only 45,000,000 tons in the whole world. Do I understand the gentleman to say that our program is to build more than half the tonnage of the world?

Mr. BURROUGHS. I have given you the statement of the chairman of the Shipping Board, which, I think, was made in an address at South Bend, Ind., on the 10th day of this month. So far as I am concerned, I sincerely hope that his prediction may be fulfilled, because I believe that we shall need every one of those ships. Certainly we shall need them if we are to have and maintain an Army in France of anywhere near 5,000,000 men. That would allow only 5 tons of shipping for the transportation and maintenance of each soldier, and I understand the best expert opinion places the amount necessary at an even higher figure than that.

What I am afraid of is that we will not get the 25,000,000 tons by 1920. I am afraid all the factors of the problem have not been taken into account. There is all the difference in the world between a paper program based upon imaginary and ideal conditions and a carefully thought-out proposition that takes into consideration every obstacle that may be reasonably anticipated. Theory has to be corrected by facts in order to be of much practical value. Mr. Hurley talks about an average of three ships a year on each of 751 ways, and says that in 1919 "the average tonnage of steel, wood, and concrete ships continuously building on each way should be about 6,000 tons." On this basis he figures that we should be able to produce in one year 13,518,000 tons, which, he says, is more than has been turned out by Great Britain in any five years of her history.

As against this prediction, which I sincerely trust may be fulfilled, but which I must say seems to me somewhat visionary, let us consider a few facts. We know that in the last 10 months we have actually built 1,000,000 tons. We know that there is now a threatened shortage of coal and an actual shortage of freight cars upon which the great fabricating yards are so vitally dependent for their supplies. We know what happened last winter, and already we are being warned that like conditions may again force shutdowns and embargoes. We know that "steel is the sinew of war," and steel, we are told, depends first of all on coal. We face a famine in coal because the railroads can not remove it from the mines fast enough to keep up production. Both at Hog Island and Bristol, where I visited the yards less than a month ago, I was told by the managers that there was no doubt in their minds about being able to build the ships provided only they could be furnished with the necessary material. We know that we have had many shortages of steel because of the inability of the railroads to get the coal to the steel mills to produce the steel. Now, if that is true on a program of 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 tons a year, what may we reasonably expect when this program is multiplied many times?

Frankly, I see no way in which it can be done, unless we greatly extend our program in the production of concrete ships. And why should we not do this? We are told that the present program provides for about 40 concrete ships, with a total capacity of about 300,000 tons. Why may it not be a million or 2,000,000 tons instead of 300,000 tons? My understanding is that such a program could be carried out without any substantial interference with the present program of steel and wood construction. Is it objected that the concrete ship is still an experiment? If so, my answer is that the fabricated steel ship is also very much of an experiment. Some of our best authorities in steel construction look with a great deal of misgiving at the fabricated ships. They are certainly quite different from any ships heretofore built in that in many instances a great part of them is, so it is stated, designed and worked out by engineers who never saw a ship drawing before. Both Mr. Ferguson and Mr. Powell speak with considerable misgiving concerning the whole scheme of the fabrication of ships. Mr. Ferguson says, "No one knows whether these ships are going to give trouble," and Mr. Powell says, "I do not think very much of the scheme. I think those gentlemen are going to learn a good deal more as they live a little longer."

Personally, from such investigation as I have been able to make, I believe in the fabricated ships; and I believe also in the concrete ships. The Faith, the 5,000-ton concrete ship launched at San Francisco early in May, seems to have fully justified its name. I understand that Mr. Hurley was the original advocate or at least one of the original advocates of the concrete ship. The Faith, which was the first of her kind to be constructed in this country, performed without any sign of vibration, meeting every test, and in some respects exceeding expectations. The cost of construction is much less than that of either the wooden or steel ship. The estimated cost of the concrete ship is said to be between $100 and $110 a ton complete, while the wooden ship costs around $165 a ton complete, and the steel ship is now costing close to $200 a ton complete. This is probably four times as much as it would have cost us to construct steel ships 8 or 10 years ago. In those days governmental aid of $5,000,000 a year would have given a very respectable merchant marine, but everybody "saw red" when the word "subsidy" was mentioned, and the consequence was that we came into the war without any merchant marine whatever that was worthy of the name so far as over-sea trade was concerned. To quote Mr. Hurley's language:

> The vast supplies which we were sending abroad were shipped under terms and conditions laid down by other nations because the great bulk of our exports was carried in ships flying foreign flags. There were American tourists everywhere; there were also American products ready to go everywhere; but American ships nowhere.

Much has been accomplished in spite of almost insuperable difficulties. The Shipping Board has added a million tons of new construction to American shipping in the last 10 months. We have taken over German and Austrian vessels with a total dead-weight tonnage of 730,176. We have requisitioned from the Dutch under the order of the President 86 vessels more with a total tonnage of 526,532. In addition, we have chartered from neutral countries 215 vessels with an aggregate dead-weight tonnage of 953,661. "To-day," Mr. Hurley says, "we have more than 1,400 ships with an approximate total dead-weight tonnage of 7,000,000 tons under the control of the Shipping Board." In the month of May we produced 53,000 tons more shipping than were produced in the entire year of 1915. In the first five months of this year we delivered almost twice as much as was built in all American shipyards in the years 1915 and 1916. The May output, according to Mr. Schwab, is the largest amount of shipping ever placed in commission in any one month in the history of the world.

When we consider the great, the almost insuperable, obstacles under which this vast increase of production has been made possible, we may well congratulate and commend all those who have been in any manner responsible for it. But while all this is true and ought to give us much hope and courage for the future, it is also equally true, so far as human foresight can forecast the future, that for many months to come the whole allied world will probably be unable to produce ships faster than the deadly submarine will destroy them. It is for this reason that it is especially and vitally important that we take every precaution by the passage of legislation like that now under consideration to safeguard and secure to the American flag every one of the ships that we are now building, as well as every one of the ships already built and every one of the ships that we propose to build.

I have the utmost confidence, Mr. Chairman, that we are going to win this great war. We may not do it this year, and we may not do it next year. It may take an Army of 3,000,000 men; it may take an Army of 5,000,000 men; it may even conceivably take an Army of 10,000,000 men. It will most certainly involve enormous expenditures and infinite sacrifice. A good part of this is due to the fact that we were not ready for it, and did not prepare for it when we ought to have seen it coming. For a long time the "world was on fire" and our house was protected by others while we were asleep. While "sparks were falling all around us" we did not even take the precaution to see that the fire department was in good working order. But, at last, thank God, we are awake, or at any rate are fast waking up. We now have an Army of very respectable size on the fighting front, and nobody has the slightest doubt but that that Army is going to give a good account of itself wherever and whenever it is called upon. Indeed, it is already doing so. Our Navy operating in foreign waters has already won the plaudits of the world. All branches of our fighting forces are maintaining the honorable traditions of the American name.

We did not seek the war. We did everything in honor possible to avoid it. For us it is a war of self-defense; for our enemies it is a war to subdue and subjugate the world. For them it was never anything else, from the moment that Germany, in defiance of all law, threw her mighty armies across the Belgian frontier. The fate of the whole war rests to-day upon the adequacy of America's war plans and the effectiveness of her war operations.

Since I became a Member of this House, about a year ago, I have voted for every war measure that has come before us for consideration. Many of these measures have not in all their details commended themselves to me. Many of them on principle I would not for a moment support in time of peace, but I have felt that they were necessary now in order to make our fighting machinery effective. So far as I am concerned, no plans can be too ample, no weapon too massive, no energy too great, to execute the true will and purpose of our people in this war, which is, as I interpret it, to impose a just, complete, and lasting peace upon a foe who must be made forever incapable of again assaulting the world. As the President, our Commander in Chief, has so well said: "Let it be force to the utmost—force without stint or limit." That is apparently the only language our enemy is capable of understanding. Very well, then, we will talk to him in that language, and by that sign, Mr. Chairman, we will surely conquer.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, there is no further desire for time on this side.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. And no further time required on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first section of the act approved September 7, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a United States Shipping Board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States, and for other purposes," is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof two paragraphs, as follows:

"The term 'vessel' includes all water craft and other artificial contrivances of whatever description and at whatever stage of construction, whether on the stocks or launched, which are used or are capable of being or are intended to be used as a means of transportation on water.

"The term 'documented under the laws of the United States' means 'registered, enrolled, or licensed under the laws of the United States.'"

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, the language at the beginning of line 8, page 2, and ending in line 15, page 2, is new matter, and is an amendment of section 1 of the shipping act. It says:

The term "vessel" includes all water craft and other artificial contrivances of whatever description and at whatever stage of construction, whether on the stocks or launched, which are used or are capable of being or are intended to be used as a means of transportation on water.

The Revised Statutes define the word "vessel" to include every description of water craft or other artificial contrivance capable of being used for transportation by water.

The definition in the bill amplifies the definition in the Revised Statutes to include not only water craft or other artificial contrivance of whatever description capable of being used or intended for use in transportation by water, but to vessels at whatever stage of construction, whether on the stocks or not.

When the Shipping Board under existing law undertook to commandeer vessels under construction in the several shipyards of the United States, vessels which had been contracted for by foreign powers, they were confronted with the fact that a vessel in the course of construction is not a vessel within the meaning of the law. Our Supreme Court in the One hundred and eighty-third United States, page 424, had held that "in the absence of such a provision a hull in the course of construction does not become a vessel until launched." Hence this amendment of the existing law is proposed in order to give the Government control over vessels from the time the keel is laid. The last paragraph is as follows:

The term "documented under the laws of the United States" means "registered, enrolled, or licensed under the laws of the United States."

That definition is added to the existing law because later on in the bill we make the bill apply to all vessels documented under the laws of the United States—that is, all vessels documented, registered, enrolled, or licensed, which would place under control of the Shipping Board vessels of 20 tons or more.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman explain the difference between registry and enrollment?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Under the navigation laws, if a vessel wishes to engage in foreign trade it must be registered. If it engages in coastwise trade it may be enrolled, but under the enrollment it can not engage in foreign trade. Hence a registered vessel is one that can engage in foreign trade, while an enrolled vessel is one that is confined to the coastwise trade.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the provision of this section includes all vessels over 20 tons?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; the provisions of the bill applying to enrolled vessels would give the Government control during the period of the war of all vessels over 20 tons.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. But not under 20 tons.

Mr. ALEXANDER. No.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. When I have been to the Shipping Board they always informed me that they did not include vessels under 1,500 tons.

Mr. ALEXANDER. For certain war purposes it may be desirable for us to control vessels of small tonnage during the period of the war.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 2 of said act is hereby amended by adding at the end of the first paragraph thereof a paragraph, as follows:

"The controlling interest in a corporation shall not be deemed to be owned by citizens of the United States (a) if the title to a majority of the stock thereof is not vested in such citizens free from any trust or fiduciary obligation in favor of any person not a citizen of the United States; or (b) if the majority of the voting power in such corporation is not vested in citizens of the United States; or (c) if through any contract or understanding it is so arranged that the majority of the voting power may be exercised, directly or indirectly, in behalf of any person who is not a citizen of the United States; or (d) if by any other means whatsoever control of the corporation is conferred upon or permitted to be exercised by any person who is not a citizen of the United States."

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, in addition to what I said a moment ago in this connection I desire to say that the meat of this whole matter may be found in the concluding sentence of this amendment, to wit that "if by any other means whatsoever control of the corporation is conferred upon or permitted to be exercised by any person who is not a citizen of the United States," the controlling interest in a corporation shall not be deemed to be owned by citizens of the United States.

In other words, by the wording of this amendment such a situation is intended to be brought to pass that by no possible legal legerdemain can any arrangement be made by which the controlling interest may be in the hands of some other person or persons than citizens of the United States, and at the same time the corporation continue to be a citizen of the United States. I rather think the original act accomplished this result, but there were certain subtle suggested possibilities under the existing law that caused the committee to report the amendment under consideration, as a corrective for these possibilities.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. I would like to call attention to the fact that in the testimony of the attorney for the Shipping Board he called attention to the fact that some law firms in New York City who represented people abroad would buy a ship and all the stockholders would be the members of this law firm, the stock being held in trust for foreign clients. As I understand it, this is to get around that arrangement.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. It seemed to the committee that the plan referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania might circumvent the purpose of the original act. Hence the amendment to afford a remedy for a possible weakness in that act.

Mr. ROBBINS. What is there in this section you are attempting to amend that would make it impossible or to prevent foreign owners from electing a dummy board of directors who are citizens of the United States and thereby through them control absolutely a shipping corporation, the vessels of which were built and owned by people or interests not of the United States, which ought to be controlled by bona fide citizens of the United States? Would not that give control to foreigners?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. How?

Mr. ROBBINS. By electing a board of dummy directors who are citizens of the United States while the actual owners would be foreigners. Why ought not this provision to go further? I am heartily in favor of this bill, and what I am suggesting is in good faith to endeavor to strengthen it if it is weak. The bill came in here without much chance on my part to investigate it, but I have before me the shipping act of September 7, 1916, which it is proposed to amend. I think this provision ought to go even further than it does and prevent the acting upon a board of directors of any person who is not a citizen of the United States.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will ask the gentleman to look to the original language of section 2. As I have stated, this act confers certain rights and privileges upon citizens of the United States. Anyone not a citizen of the United States is denied these rights and privileges.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I was going to suggest, in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS], that you could not have dummy directors except through an arrangement between the dummies and the real parties in interest. Subdivision C of section 2 is so drawn as to prevent an arrangement of that sort, it seems to me.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes, that is true.

Mr. ROBBINS. That, of course, applies only to the majority stock.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The amendment provides that under the circumstances recited the controlling interest in a corporation shall not be deemed to be owned by citizens of the United States.

If such a scheme as the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggests, was sought to be worked out, it would not only be in fraud of the law, but would be inoperative, since it would be an arrangement by a contract, or understanding for the majority of the voting power to be exercised in behalf of some one not a citizen of the United States. Under the terms of the amendment, should such a scheme be perfected, the controlling interest in the corporation would be held not to be owned by citizens of the United States. The scheme would instantly fail of its purpose, if sought to be effected on the line indicated in the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROBBINS. I want to be sure about it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The committee invites constructive criticism of the pending bill. It is not wedded to the language reported, and desires to make the bill as strong and as comprehensive as it may be made.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Shortly after the beginning of the European war certain ships under the register of a neutral government were transferred under a trust arrangement to American citizens so that those ships could have the protection of the neutral flag of our Government. The original shipping bill was designed to give the benefit of American registry to ships owned bona fide by citizens of the United States and not under color by foreign owners. As has been pointed out by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], section 2, as originally framed, did not reach the case where there was mere colorable title of ownership. The legal title of a majority interest might be owned by American citizens, and yet there might be trust arrangements whereby the real title would be in foreigners, and the profits accruing from the operation of the ships would go to foreigners.

The Shipping Board has called attention to the evasion of the real purpose of the law so as to allow Americans to have foreign-built ships come within the benefits of American registry and have suggested the amendment that is incorporated here in section 2. This will correct abuses that have been called to the attention of the department and only allow the protection of American registry to those cases where there has been bona fide transfer of ownership to American citizens of the majority interests of the company in the control of these foreign-built ships.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That section 9 of said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 9. That any vessel purchased, chartered, or leased from the board may be registered or enrolled and licensed, or both registered and enrolled and licensed, as a vessel of the United States and entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining thereto: Provided, That foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry or enrollment and license under this act, and vessels owned, chartered, or leased by any corporation in which the United States is a stockholder, and vessels sold, leased, or chartered to any person a citizen of the United States, as provided in this act, may engage in the coastwise trade of the United States while owned, leased, or chartered by such a person.

"Every vessel purchased, chartered, or leased from the board shall, unless otherwise authorized by the board, be operated only under such registry or enrollment and license. Such vessels while employed solely as merchant vessels shall be subject to all laws, regulations, and liabilities governing merchant vessels, whether the United States be interested therein as owner, in whole or in part, or hold any mortgage, lien, or other interest therein. No such vessel, without the approval of the board, shall be transferred to a foreign registry or flag, or sold; nor, except under regulations prescribed by the board, be chartered or leased.

"No vessel documented under the laws of the United States or owned by any person a citizen of the United States or by a corporation organized under the laws of the United States or of any State, Territory, District, or possession thereof, except one which the board is prohibited from purchasing, shall be sold to any person not a citizen of the United States or transferred to or placed under a foreign registry or flag, unless such vessel is first tendered to the board at the price in good faith offered by others, or, if no such offer, at a fair price to be determined in the manner provided in section 10.

"Any vessel sold, chartered, leased, transferred to or placed under a foreign registry or flag, or operated in violation of any provision of this section shall be forfeited to the United States, and whoever violates any provision of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of not more than $5,000 or to imprisonment for not more than five years, or both."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I think I can in a very few words explain wherein section 3 of the pending bill amends section 9 of the shipping act. The first paragraph of section 3, amending section 9 of the shipping act is in the language of the first paragraph of section 9, except, beginning in lines 20 and 21, these words are added at the end of the paragraph, "while owned, leased, or chartered by such a person." We simply make it clear that vessels mentioned sold, leased, or chartered from the board shall be entitled to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States while owned, leased, or chartered by a citizen of the United States. While that was the intent of the original act, yet it was not made entirely clear.

The provisions of section 3, beginning with the second paragraph, in line 22 down to line 8, page 4, is in the language of the second paragraph of section 9 of existing law.

The third paragraph of section 3, beginning in line 9, page 4, and ending with line 19, page 4, is in the language of the third paragraph, existing law, except we have taken the first sentence out of the paragraph and transferred it to section 4, which adds section 37 as a new section to the shipping act, and provides that "when the United States is at war, or during any national emergency, the existence of which is declared by proclamation of the President, no vessel registered or enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States shall, without the approval of the board, be sold, leased, or chartered to any person not a citizen of the United States, or transferred to a foreign registry or flag." In framing the bill and amending section 9 of the shipping act, we thought that the language should more properly be incorporated in section 37. Now, in line 9, page 4, we insert "documented" instead of the words "registered or enrolled and licensed," as provided in section 9 of the shipping act. And in lines 11 and 12 and 13 we add, "or by a corporation organized under the laws of the United States, or of any State, Territory, District, or possession thereof," and in lines 20 and 21, page 4, the new matter is as follows:

To or placed under a foreign registry or flag.

These are the only amendments of section 9 of the shipping act.

The existing law provides that the vessels may not be transferred to a foreign flag.

It is the opinion of counsel for the Shipping Board that the language is susceptible of this construction, that in order to forbid the transfer of a vessel to a foreign flag it would presuppose that the vessel should have been registered or enrolled or licensed under the laws of the United States, and it would only be in the event that the vessel had been so registered, enrolled, or licensed the transfer to a foreign flag would be unlawful; hence the language "to or placed," so that "any vessel sold, chartered, leased, transferred to or placed under a foreign registry or flag" is forbidden; hence if a vessel should be built in an American shipyard and should not apply for a registry or enrollment or license it may not be transferred to a foreign flag without the consent of the Shipping Board. It is simply to amplify the law and to throw every safeguard around our shipping that is possible.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman explain why in this bill, line 12, page 4, the term is used "district, or possession thereof"?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS. I can understand the word "district" probably relates to the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I ask that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is there any authority in the possessions of the United States for incorporating shipbuilding companies? Is that to extend an unknown authority that has not existed and is that extended out beyond the power of supervision of the United States? It seems to me we might by this law.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is very difficult to define just what our relations are in the Philippine Islands. The islands of Guam and Tutuila and the Panama Canal Zone are possessions of the United States.

Mr. ROBBINS. Does the gentleman say there is any authority of law in those places to incorporate ship companies——

Mr. ALEXANDER. None that I know of.

Mr. ROBBINS. I am asking, Is there any authority in those possessions which the gentleman has enumerated and others, such as the island of Hawaii and the Virgin Islands, which we have recently taken over, to incorporate ship companies?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly there must be in the Philippine Islands which is an organized body.

Mr. ALEXANDER. They have a government of their own. We have framed a constitution of the Philippine Islands, and in large measure they have local self-government and it is not our intention to interfere with them, but in framing this bill we want to be sure in amending existing law to make the law broad enough to protect our own Government in the exercise of any rightful authority it may be called upon to exercise.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is it intended to apply any authority that may be used to incorporate ship companies there?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Well, I do not think it necessary to decide that question, but it is very clear that we are not conferring power to incorporate companies there, but we do not want to surrender any control we may have over vessels documented under the laws of the United States, or owned by citizens of the United States or by a corporation organized under the laws of the United States, or of any State, Territory, District, or possession thereof.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. As I understand, we want to make this cover any corporation that is now organized or might be organized under any present law or in any law that might authorize a corporation to organize under the authority of the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire whether this section is limited merely to the war period or whether it has its effect after the war terminates?

Mr. ALEXANDER. This provision is general in its nature, and is not limited to the period of the war.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, as I understand the purpose of the amendment, it is that even after the war is ended there can be no transfer of any ship built in American shipyards to any private interest that is foreign in its citizenship without the approval of the Shipping Board?

Mr. ALEXANDER. In other words, if the vessel is documented under the laws of the United States, or owned by a citizen of the United States, and so forth, it must be tendered to the Shipping Board first, and the Shipping Board shall have the privilege to purchase before it is sold on foreign account. That is all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course I thought that when the war is ended——

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is a provision of the existing law.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is a provision of the existing law so far as the shipping act is concerned.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Which was passed only recently.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It was passed on September 16, 1916.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. We are not changing existing law in that respect at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am quite well aware of that, but I am seeking to ascertain the real purpose of the committee in limiting transfers in a regular way of vessels in American shipyards. Then, I take it, that under this provision it would virtually discourage foreign shipping interests or foreign investors from coming into this country to have their ships built, no matter whether our shipyards would be lying idle or not.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. What I meant to say was that the committee had no intention in connection with the pending bill to do anything on the line which the gentleman is discussing. He is discussing matters provided for by existing law.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is existing law——

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Laws now on the statute books.

Mr. STAFFORD (continuing). So far as it was embodied in the shipping act passed in 1916. We are amending that act, and it is possible for us now to change it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Oh, yes. But we did not undertake to amend the law in the respect referred to by the gentleman. That substantive matter was fully considered before these amendatory sections were reported by the committee. There was no suggestion from any quarter that it was necessary to change established existing law other than we have undertaken to do.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was existing law before we passed the shipping act, and I understand it is the policy recommended by the administration and supported by the committee.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. No matter how long after the war terminates, foreign investors desiring ships can not come here to have their ships built in American shipyards without having them offered first to the Shipping Board.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That was the policy established by this House some time ago, and we did not think it was well to undertake to change it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think that that will rather discourage the building of ships for foreign countries?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is the policy of foreign nations, and we do in substance do more than to say to shipowners: "If you want to sell, at least give your own country an opportunity to buy." If when the opportunity is given, the United States does not care to buy, it is not likely the Shipping Board would interfere with the sale to other parties.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, before the outbreak of the war, Great Britain and France and others of the allied countries had orders with American shipbuilding concerns for ships, and yet I can see when we return to a peace basis, with this condition existing, it would discourage foreign investors from placing orders for ships in American shipyards if they were subject to the condition that the ship when completed would first have to be offered to the Shipping Board before it could be sold.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is not the effect of this section. It says:

No vessel owned by any person or citizen of the United States or by a corporation organized under the laws of the United States—

And so on. There is another provision of the law that relates to foreigners seeking to have vessels constructed in the yards of the United States. We will come to that later.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is, it will discourage, as I said before, foreign interests from having ships built in American shipyards.

Mr. HARDY. If the gentleman will permit me, I want to say that the shipping act in that respect was passed because we ascertained the fact that nearly every big nation since this war began has passed laws forbidding the transfer of ships under their flags to foreign governments.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is for during the war. It was a war exigency.

Mr. HARDY. I do not know whether it is or not. But England has done it, France has done it, and Germany has done it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I justify that position, but they did not have the policy before the war. They were in war before we passed the shipping act.

Mr. HARDY. We provide further by forbidding the owners of vessels under the American flag from transferring them to other flags.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That said act is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof eight sections, as follows:

"SEC. 37. That when the United States is at war or during any national emergency, the existence of which is declared by proclamation of the President, it shall be unlawful, without first obtaining the approval of the board:

"(a) To transfer to or place under any foreign registry or flag any vessel owned in whole or in part by any person a citizen of the United States or by a corporation organized under the laws of the United States, or of any State, Territory, District, or possession thereof; or

"(b) To sell, mortgage, lease, charter, deliver, or in any manner transfer, or agree to sell, mortgage, lease, charter, deliver, or in any manner transfer, to any person not a citizen of the United States, (1) any such vessel or any interest therein, or (2) any vessel documented under the laws of the United States, or any interest therein, or (3) any shipyard, dry dock, shipbuilding or ship repairing plant or facilities, or any interest therein; or

"(c) To enter into any contract, agreement, or understanding to construct a vessel within the United States for or to be delivered to any person not a citizen of the United States; or

"(d) To make any agreement or effect any understanding whereby there is vested in or for the benefit of any person not a citizen of the United States, the controlling interest or a majority of the voting power in a corporation which is organized under the laws of the United States, or of any State, Territory, District, or possession thereof, and which owns any vessels, shipyard, dry dock, or shipbuilding or ship repairing plant or facilities; or

"(e) To cause or procure any vessel constructed in whole or in part within the United States, which has never cleared for any foreign port, to depart from a port of the United States before it has been documented under the laws of the United States.

"Whoever violates, or attempts or conspires to violate, any of the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

"Any vessel, shipyard, dry dock, shipbuilding, or ship repairing plant or facilities, or interest therein, sold, mortgaged, leased, chartered, delivered, transferred, or documented, or agreed to be sold, mortgaged, leased, chartered, delivered, transferred, or documented, in violation of any of the provisions of this section, and any stocks, bonds, or other securities sold or transferred, or agreed to be sold or transferred, in violation of any of such provisions, or any vessel departing in violation of the provisions of subdivision (e), shall be forfeited to the United States.

"Any such sale, mortgage, lease, charter, delivery, transfer, documentation, or agreement therefor shall be void, whether made within or without the United States, and any consideration paid therefor or deposited in connection therewith shall be recoverable at the suit of the person who has paid or deposited the same, or of his successors or assigns, after the tender of such vessel, shipyard, dry dock, shipbuilding, or ship repairing plant or facilities, or interest therein, or of such stocks, bonds, or other securities, to the person entitled thereto, or after forfeiture thereof to the United States.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This is subject to amendment, as I understand it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I frankly confess that I am not familiar with the act which this act seeks to amend, and I am not very familiar with this act. I asked the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] while he occupied the floor in general debate, if this was a war measure, and he replied that it was. But, as I understand, subsequently, although I was called out for the last 20 or 30 minutes, it was stated that this is permanent law in large part, without regard to the war emergency.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think the gentleman has not correctly quoted my statement. I said in large part the provisions of this bill are war provisions, and that is true. The provisions of this section 3, adding section 27 to the shipping act, are war emergency provisions and do not apply except in the event of war or a national emergency.

Mr. CANNON. What I want to know—and I do not suppose I can know without great investigation and far greater knowledge than I have—is when this Shipping Board is going to go out of existence.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The law creating the Shipping Board is permanent law.

Mr. CANNON. This is permanent law? We are to have it with us always unless the law is amended?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I hope we will always have some governmental agency that will have to do with our American merchant marine, whether it is the Shipping Board or some other agency.

Mr. CANNON. We never had the Shipping Board before?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; but I think it is quite necessary that we should have it now and in the future.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that we are at liberty to buy ships built in foreign countries. In other words, our law that prohibited a foreign-built ship from flying the American flag and engaging in our coastwise trade has been repealed, has it not?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; it has not been repealed. We have a law which provides that foreign-built ships owned by American citizens may be admitted to American registry, to engage in the foreign trade. That is a provision, section 5, of the Panama Canal act.

Mr. CANNON. Yes. I understood it was in some act.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And in this Congress the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries reported out a bill providing that ships foreign owned might be admitted to American registry under certain limitations during the period of the war, and it passed this House and the Senate without any question. I refer to the act of October 6, 1917.

Mr. CANNON. They can not, then, after the war engage in our coastwise trade?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, no.

Mr. CANNON. After the war is over, when peace comes, do we have to get anybody's authority, with our great number of shipyards that we are going to have, before we can build a ship and sell it to anybody in the world?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; not after the end of the war.

Mr. CANNON. Not after the end of the war?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will say six months after the end of the war, to be accurate.

Mr. CANNON. So that we will be in the same condition that the balance of the world is supposed to be in as regards us—that we will have an industry in the United States that can build ships and sell them to anybody?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think so, and I hope that will be the result.

Mr. CANNON. Without anybody's leave?

Mr. ALEXANDER Yes. I hope that we may be able to build ships for the world. I would not want to put any limitation on that privilege on the part of the American shipyards.

Mr. HARDY. If the gentleman will permit, I will read section 37, of which this clause is a part. It begins with the statement that "When the United States is at war, or during any national emergency, the existence of which is declared by the proclamation of the President, it shall be unlawful" to do all these things, ending with that clause just before paragraph 38, so that this part of this bill is limited specifically to during the war or a national emergency.

Mr. CANNON. I am very glad indeed to have the assurance of the gentleman, who I have no doubt is familiar with the legislation heretofore enacted and the proposed legislation, that when the war closes, or six months thereafter, we will have as much right to sell a ship built in our own yard to anybody in the world as we have to sell a bushel of wheat.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I share the gentleman's wish, and I would regret to put any limitation on that right.

Mr. CANNON. I may be pardoned, perhaps, for my ignorance in asking these questions, because it is impossible for a man of my limited capacity to keep track of all the legislation that has been enacted since the declaration of war.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman would be a marvel if he could.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr STAFFORD. This section, which applies to vessels built in the United States during the period of the war or during a national emergency, the existence of which is declared by proclamation of the President, would permit the President to determine without review the finality of the question of what that emergency is?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. So that if the President saw fit, even for economic reasons, to determine that it was for the best interests that these vessels, built in this country, should not be sold abroad, and he would declare that by proclamation, the prohibition of this section would apply?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. He would have to say that it was a national emergency.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The existing law is to this effect:

> When the United States is at war, or during any national emergency, the existence of which is declared by proclamation of the President, no vessel registered or enrolled or licensed under the laws of the United States shall, without the approval of the board, be sold, leased, or chartered to any person not a citizen of the United States or transferred to a foreign registry or flag.

That is the existing law.

Mr. STAFFORD. So that the mere conclusion of peace will not restore our shipping conditions back to the conditions that prevailed before the war, because the conditions following the war will be abnormal, undoubtedly, and might cause the President, because of the exigency, to declare that an emergency arises whereby this law should still continue.

Mr. ALEXANDER. For instance, after the war began in Europe on August 1, 1914, we had this condition, that there was no existing law to prevent vessels under American registry from being transferred to a foreign flag; but under the shipping act of September 16, 1916, the President would have had the power to prevent transfers. We had a great dearth of shipping. Because we did not have bottoms in which to transport our commodities to Europe, the price of cotton fell to 6 cents a pound and ocean freight rates increased a thousand per cent; and following the present war a condition might ensue that might compel the President, in the national interest, to declare a national emergency to exist and prevent those transfers as long as the emergency continued.

For instance, we will have millions of men in Europe; we will have vast supplies and munitions there; and it is going to take a long time to get our soldiers home and restore normal peace conditions; and other nations will be reaching out to get tonnage in order to meet their demands, which of course have become acute and will become more acute on account of the war; and hence it gives the President the power to protect us in that event.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has raised a question that I do not think has been cleared up, not to my mind, at least. It does not bear exactly on this section, however. This is a dual bill. The first three sections of it are permanent law. They are amendments to the act of September 7, 1916. The last eight sections, designated as under section 37, are new law and are only emergency legislation, in force "during the war or during a national emergency." I do not know what that would cover, but the President's proclamation would, of course, define such emergency and give effect to it.

This temporary provision here, during the war, contradicts the permanent section, I think. For instance, under subdivision (b) the transfer of any vessel or of "any interest therein" is prohibited. The permanent law applies only to the majority interests in a vessel or corporation owning vessels. That is clearly a contradiction. I do not know whether this is the committee's intention or not, that during the war, or during an emergency, there could not be any transfer even of shares of stock in any corporation owning ships of a minority holding of the shares of stock; but that is what is accomplished by this legislation.

Mr. ALEXANDER. What line is the gentleman referring to?

Mr. ROBBINS. Lines 17 and 18, on page 5. Unless you get the approval of the Shipping Board, it prohibits absolutely the transfer of any interest whatever in any documented ship or stock in a company or any interest in any dry dock. Those provisions of the temporary law apply to any interest whatever. Now, the first sections, the permanent law, apply only to the controlling interest. If it is the intention to make it that way, then you have done that, but I do not think that ought to be the intention.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is the intention of the act.

Mr. ROBBINS. Then it is contradictory.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Why is it contradictory?

Mr. HADLEY. Is not the effect of the two provisions to which the gentleman refers to lay down a proviso to the permanent law, putting a limitation on the act in time of war or emergency? We are doing that every day in all of our legislation, passing provisions which are not applicable in time of peace, and drawing a definite distinction between the permanent law for times of peace and the temporary law for time of war or emergency. As the chairman of the committee states, the intention is to prevent the transfer of any interest in shipping during the period of the war.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is to say that a corporation organized to own shipping can operate during a time of peace if a majority of the stock is owned by American citizens, but as soon as the war comes on all the stock must be transferred to American citizens or forfeited to the United States. That is what is done by this legislation.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Why does the gentleman make that statement?

Mr. ROBBINS. Because that is exactly what this act does.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Where does the gentleman find the support of his statement in the law?

Mr. ROBBINS. You do that by section 37. You enumerate six or eight things that can not occur during war or national emergency.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. But there is no affirmative requirement that existing interests shall be transferred. If it is held in the United States, you can not dispose of it; but I understood the gentleman just now to say that when war came on some one who was not a citizen of the United States who held an interest in such a corporation would be required to transfer that interest to some citizen of the United States.

Mr. ROBBINS. Certainly.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. There is nothing in the law to that effect.

Mr. ROBBINS. I am assuming that this law is in effect during this war.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is correct.

Mr. ROBBINS. Suppose a company is organized to operate between the United States and South America. That is one of the commercial fields we want to stimulate. Now, suppose a minority of the stock is owned in Brazil and a majority of the stock is owned in the United States. When war comes on, it does not matter between what countries, the Brazilian stockholders will have to divest themselves of their stock.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman point out anything in the law imposing that requirement on the Brazilian stockholders?

Mr. ROBBINS. Under section 37 during time of war it is unlawful for any foreigner to hold any interest. You go on to say in this section what can not be done.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman read anything which makes it unlawful for a citizen of Brazil to continue to hold his interest during the war?

Mr. ROBBINS. Subdivision (b).

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will read subdivision (b). That provides that when the United States is at war or during any national emergency it shall be unlawful, without first obtaining the approval of the board—

(b) To sell, mortgage, lease, charter, deliver, or in any manner transfer, or agree to sell, mortgage, lease, charter, deliver, or in any manner transfer, to any person not a citizen of the United States, (1) any such vessel or any interest therein, or (2) any vessel documented under the laws of the United States, or any interest therein, or (3) any shipyard, dry dock, shipbuilding or ship-repairing plant or facilities, or any interest therein.

This language does not require the Brazilian stockholder to sell his interest to some one in the United States?

Mr. ROBBINS. Because such stockholders can not hold it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Why not?

Mr. ROBBINS. Because such stock will be forfeited under this act.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. There is no provision against his holding it.

Mr. ROBBINS. This act causes a forfeiture of all such stock or interest.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Point out the provision imposing such a forfeiture.

Mr. ROBBINS. He can not hold any interest in any vessel or dock. That is what the law says.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman point to any provision in the law supporting the assertion which he has just made?

Mr. ROBBINS. The things are enumerated here that can not be done. These are:

SEC. 37. That when the United States is at war or during any national emergency, the existence of which is declared by proclamation of the President, it shall be unlawful, without first obtaining the approval of the board:

(a) To transfer to or place under any foreign registry or flag any vessel owned in whole or in part by any person a citizen of the United States or by a corporation organized under the laws of the United States, or of any State, Territory, District, or possession thereof; or

(b) To sell, mortgage, lease, charter, deliver, or in any manner transfer, or agree to sell, mortgage, lease, charter, deliver, or in any manner transfer, to any person not a citizen of the United States, (1) any such vessel or any interest therein, or (2) any vessel documented under the laws of the United States, or any interest therein, or (3) any shipyard, dry dock, shipbuilding or ship-repairing plant or facilities, or any interest therein.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. In other words, there can not be a transfer pending the war.

Mr. ROBBINS. You prohibit any interest in any vessel being held by a foreigner.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Oh, no. It simply prevents any interest in a vessel from being transferred. That does not prohibit the holding of any interest.

Mr. ROBBINS. Why not?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Because the law does not forbid it.

If the gentleman will pardon me, I will say that the purpose of this section is to preserve the status of property rights in ships, shipyards and so forth during the pendency of war, or during the period of a national emergency declared by the President. It merely preserves the status, and does not require anyone to part with his interest. This status may not be changed by sale, mortgage, lease, or any manner of transfer.

Mr. ROBBINS. If that be true, how could such provision be enforced against a ship company that is owned abroad under American charter and operated as a line of steamships to foreign countries? How could you enforce it against the North German Lloyd Line, for example, owned in Germany and the title held by an American Co.? You do not mean ships built in this country could be taken over by that line? If this could be done, the act will be ineffectual.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. What has that got to do with it? Section 37 provides that when the United States is at war or during any national emergency, the existence of which is declared by proclamation of the President, it shall be unlawful, without first obtaining the approval of the board, to transfer, sell, mortgage, lease, charter, deliver to any person not a citizen of the United States the property, or interest in property indicated.

No amount of interpretation can make the language plainer than it is. It means what it says, but I repeat that there is nothing in the section requiring an alien or other stockholders to transfer his stock to an American citizen, during war, or an emergency.

Mr. ROBBINS. Does it not discourage the very thing that I am pointing out, namely, our foreign commerce. Both our citizens and our Government after the war is over wish to encourage foreign commerce. One of the ways that we will encourage foreign commerce with other nations is to induce people of other countries that we trade with to become interested in steamship lines that ply between their country and our own.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. During the war we are interested in maintaining our control over every interest in ships and shipyards owned by American citizens. That is all this section proposes to do.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is true, but I am looking beyond the war. If we make peace terms next year in the present war, and two years later we have a war with Japan, as an illustration only—for I hope we may never have such war or any other war—will not this act be in effect them?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will it not have a harmful effect on prospective investors in shipping securities to pass a law that will forfeit such investments when war occurs?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Does the gentleman think that this is wise legislation with respect to the existing war, but that it would be unwise legislation with reference to some hypothetical future war? I do not see how he can draw such a conclusion.

Mr. ROBBINS. The gentleman does not seem to want the act criticized.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes, I do; I invite all the just criticism that may be made.

Mr. ROBBINS. I say that if this act will defeat the extension of the commerce of the United States it ought not to be passed. By holding out a threat to foreign investors who would invest in shipping generally with us, to enact any law that would deter those investors, in case of war their interests would be in jeopardy and they would have to offer such investments for sale.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Why does the gentleman make that statement when there is not a word, or a line in the act that will support such a conclusion. The act deals with citizens of the United States and with transfers on their part.

Mr. ROBBINS. The bill, in section 37, provides, by the use of the words continually "or any interest therein," just such result. That means the control of the minority stockholders.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield to me, to see if I can make it clear?

Mr. ROBBINS. I yield.

Mr. HARDY. It simply means that while we are at war—this war or any other war just like it—during that war no American citizen owning a ship shall be allowed to sell that ship to a foreigner without the consent of the Shipping Board. That is all it means—that no American citizen during this war may sell any ship that he owns, or any interest in a ship that he owns, to a foreigner without the consent of the Shipping Board. It is as plain as it can be.

Mr. ROBBINS. What about the minority's interest? It surely is forfeited by the provisions of this act in its present form.

Mr. WALSH rose.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, just a word. This matter I think has been pretty well developed. The gentleman from Pennsylvania first presents a proposition of construction and then one of policy. With respect to the proposition of construction or interpretation I undertake to say, as I have said before, that there is nothing in the law that requires—to use his own illustration—the Brazilian stockholder after war is declared, to transfer his interest in an American ship to an American. So much for the proposition of construction. With reference to the proposition of policy, if it is admitted that the law is a wise one with reference to the existing war, why, as a matter of policy, would it not be a wise one with reference to some future war? Why would it not be as good policy then as now to retain control over American ships and shipyards during the pendency of war?

The gentleman asks a question about the minority interests. We go further in this emergency clause than in the permanent portion of the law with respect to minority interests. In the permanent portion of the law we do not forbid the transfer of minority interests. The provisions of permanent law in this connection relate to the controlling interests; but under the emergency section, having in mind its great purpose, which is to maintain the absolute control of the United States over all interests in shipping and shipyards owned by citizens of the United States, we do provide not only with reference to the controlling interests, but with reference to the minority interests, "that neither shall be mortgaged, sold, or in anywise transferred during the war, or the emergency declared by the President, without the consent of the Shipping Board." Does not the gentleman agree with me that what may be wise and necessary as an emergency proposition, need not be repeated in the permanent law?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] has expressed very clearly the thoughts which I had in mind as to what this section contains. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] is a very close student of legislation here, and usually criticisms which he makes are well founded as to construction to be placed upon legislation. The words which seem to give him difficulty are "any interest therein" referring to vessels or charters. I agree fully with the committee and think their language is phrased here so that there can be no misinterpretation about it, and that the authority which they seek to put into force is that in the case of the existing war, or in case of a future war, with reference to vessels—and we have to depend on ships for our foreign commerce—when war is declared it shall be impossible for American citizens to transfer their interests in these ships to some foreign corporation or citizenship and thereby, to that extent, place beyond our control and jurisdiction these ships engaged in foreign commerce. In other words, we seek to maintain the ownership of those vessels in the same situation that they were immediately before the war was declared, and I submit that that should be so—that it is a poor time in time of war to let the control or ownership of our shipping pass out of the hands of American citizens; that it ought to be kept in the same control and subject to the same jurisdiction that it is in peace times.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Also just what the gentleman has said in reference to ships is made by section 3 to apply to shipyards.

Mr. WALSH. Yes, of course; and I direct the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that that applies to shipyards and that in so far as this section is concerned it is surely an emergency section, so to speak, and applies only during the war time, and it would seem to me that this is a good time to announce that policy and to put it into effect and to state that in the future, if we should become involved in any other war, which we all hope and pray we may not, this legislation shall then become effective and that the ownership of ships and vessels and shipyards shall be held, so to speak, in statu quo upon the outbreak of the war, and that these persons shall not be permitted to divest themselves of ownership and thereby put themselves to that extent out of the jurisdiction and control of the United States authorities, which are supposed to exercise jurisdiction over these vessels engaged in foreign commerce. If the gentleman will read the various subsections and section 37 again, in consideration with what the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] have said, I think he will see that it is not susceptible to the interpretation which he puts upon it, and that the words "or any interest therein" need not give him the concern which he expressed.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 39. That in any action or proceeding under the provisions of this act to enforce the forfeiture of any vessel or interest therein or of any stocks, bonds, or any other securities, the conviction in a court of criminal jurisdiction of any person for a violation thereof with respect to such vessel or to such stocks, bonds, or other securities, shall constitute prima facie evidence of such violation against the person so convicted.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 20, after the word "enforce," strike out the word "the" and insert in lieu thereof the word "a," and in line 20, after the word "forfeiture," strike out the words "of any vessel or interest therein or of any stocks, bonds, or any other securities," and in line 23, after the word "respect," strike out the words "such vessel or to such stocks, bonds, or other securities" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the subject matter of the forfeiture."

Mr. ALEXANDER. "The subject of the forfeiture" would be better language. So it would read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That in any action or proceeding under the provisions of this act to enforce a forfeiture the conviction in a court of criminal jurisdiction of any person for a violation thereof in respect to the subject of the forfeiture shall constitute prima facie evidence of such violation against the person so convicted.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 40. That whenever any bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or conveyance of any vessel, or part thereof, or interest therein, is presented to any collector of the customs to be recorded, the vendee, mortgagee or transferee shall file therewith a written declaration in such form as the board may by regulation prescribe, setting forth the facts relating to his citizenship, and such other facts as the board requires, showing that the transaction does not involve a violation of any of the provisions of sections 9 or 37. Unless the board, before such presentation, has failed to prescribe such form, no such bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or conveyance shall be valid against any person whatsoever until such declaration has been filed. Any declaration filed by or in behalf of a corporation shall be signed by the president, secretary, or treasurer thereof.

Whoever knowingly makes any false statement of a material fact in any such declaration shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of not more than $5,000, or to imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question with reference to evidence required there as to ownership in a corporation. Why is it not better to provide that such evidence shall also be accompanied by a certified resolution of the board of directors instead of a statement just signed by the president, secretary, and treasurer? There are some jurisdictions in which that is required as evidence of corporate action. It is best evidence of corporate action to require a certified copy of the action of the board of directors under the seal of the corporation. That is really the evidence of corporate action, and the best evidence. I should think in a case of this kind, involving the title to a ship or other property, that such evidence should be produced.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Has the gentleman read section 41?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes; I have read it through. I am speaking of the evidence of corporate action required here in this section.

Mr. ALEXANDER (reading):

"Section 40 further facilitates the practical enforcement of the new provisions by requiring a declaration to be filed with all bills of sale, mortgages, hypothecations, or conveyances recorded with collectors of customs, setting forth the facts relating to the citizenship of the vendee, mortgagee, or transferee; and a heavy penalty is provided for any person who knowingly makes a material false statement in such declaration. This section will call to the attention of shipowners and their brokers and attorneys the prohibitions of the law and will make it easier to nip in the bud any attempted violation. In its phraseology the section follows the language of the present Federal recording act (R. S., 4192), except that until the statement is filed the transaction is declared to be invalid against any person whatsoever. Under existing law, unrecorded instruments of this character are invalid against 'any person other than the grantor or mortgagor, his heirs and devisees, and persons having actual notice thereof.' This modification is necessary to effectuate the purpose of absolutely preventing sales, mortgages, or conveyances to persons whose citizenship is not certified to."

Mr. ROBBINS. Well, I am only making the suggestion. I am not going to offer an amendment. I am speaking of the corporate action of a corporation and the evidence thereof. Of course, evidence of the action of a corporation would be fully set out by such resolution.

Mr. ALEXANDER. This is a question of proof of the requirements of sections 9 and 37.

Mr. HARDY. I think the gentleman has in mind the action of the corporation selling their interest. That might be required to be of record, but this section is to affect the buyer and to determine the citizenship, and see it is in compliance with the law.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 42. That any vessel registered, enrolled, or licensed under the laws of the United States shall be deemed to continue to be documented under the laws of the United States within the meaning of subdivision (b) of section 37, until such registry, enrollment, or license is surrendered with the approval of the board, the provisions of any other act of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman of the committee, or some member of it, whether the definition of "vessel" as set out in this act would include the class of craft which we provided for the other day to be documented—usually yachts or small fishing craft. I think it was over 16 feet long——

Mr. ALEXANDER. Under the definition of "documented" vessels, in the first section of this bill, are included vessels registered and enrolled or licensed under the laws of the United States which would not include any vessel of less than 20 tons register.

Mr. WALSH. It would not include those smaller craft, the registration for which we provided the other day?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; that is, in the bill for numbering the gentleman means.

Mr. WALSH. For numbering.

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; it would not affect them.

Mr. WALSH. So as to fishermen having small craft of 16 to 18 tons and wanting to sell them to some person who is not a citizen it would not apply?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask a question suggested by the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts. This applies to all water craft. Would it apply——

Mr. ALEXANDER. It does not apply to all water craft. It applies to vessels of 20 tons and over.

Mr. ROBBINS. I mean in excess of 20 tons. Does it apply to craft employed on rivers in domestic commerce?

Mr. ALEXANDER. All rivers, lakes, bays, sounds, and the ocean.

Mr. ROBBINS. Would it apply to the Monongahela River craft?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I suppose it would, if there is any craft on the Monongahela River of 20-ton registry or over.

Mr. ROBBINS. There is a great deal of it there. In fact, there are thousands of tons of it. The commerce on the Monongahela is the largest of any inland stream.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I understand. I apprehend the Shipping Board would not place any limitations on any craft of that sort unless it should become necessary as a war measure; but on the seacoasts during the period of the war it may be quite necessary for the Shipping Board to have supervision over all vessels to which the bill applies.

Mr. ROBBINS. I can understand why it should apply to seacoast craft, but why should it apply to inland streams like the Monongahela and Ohio?

Mr. ALEXANDER. We might have put in exceptions of that sort if it had been thought necessary, but we hardly thought it was necessary to do so. We will assume that the Shipping Board is composed of men of average intelligence, that they are thoroughly patriotic, and that they want to facilitate our commerce and not place any obstacles in the way of legitimate enterprise and will administer this law in a reasonable way.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state what was in contemplation in the definition of "vessel" when they said "all water craft and other artificial contrivances of whatever description"? Is that in the present law?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is the language of the existing law and had been from time immemorial. The word "vessel" includes every description of water craft and every contrivance capable of being used in transportation by water. That is the definition given of vessel in the Revised Statutes.

Mr. WALSH. I wondered what that included.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It does not say just what it includes.

Mr. WALSH. It does not permit much of anything to escape that will float?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is the existing law, and has been, as I have said, for a long time.

Mr. ROBBINS. I presume that relates to these hydroplanes that are being built, and to keep them from going into the ownership of foreign countries.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Possibly.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That this act may be cited as "Shipping act amendment, 1918."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to inquire in all seriousness, What is the need of section 5? I question whether heretofore we have adopted any such policy of describing an act that was amendatory of another act that it should be known as an amendment of said act.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is a matter of convenience. The committee is not wedded to it, but this is a very comprehensive piece of legislation, and in referring to it for the purpose of amendment or in the way of citation in any decision by the court it would be much more convenient to say "shipping-act amendment, 1918." I think that is sufficient reason.

Mr. STAFFORD. As suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, it might lead to confusion.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The purpose of it is to prevent confusion.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not see where it would be serviceable at all in referring to this act. I can see the reason for describing the principal act as "the shipping act of 1916."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Well——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 10, strike out section 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to what the chairman said with reference to this section, and I can see the purpose the committee had, but inasmuch as we are amending the shipping act and provide in the last section of the shipping act as amended that it shall be known as the shipping act, it would seem to me that it would be unnecessary to cite that amendment as the shipping-act amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. For that reason I am willing to concede the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House as amended, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHALLENBERGER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 12100, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? [After a pause.] If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, and also that all those who have spoken on the bill may be permitted to revise and extend their remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that all those who have spoken on the bill may be permitted to revise and extend their remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman say "within five days"?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; within five days.

The SPEAKER. Within five legislative days. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PRESCRIPTION OF CHARTER RATES AND FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 12099, and move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12099) to confer on the President the power to prescribe charter rates and freight rates and to requisition vessels, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12099.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 20, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting communication from the Assistant Attorney General submitting a list of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims in favor of claimants in Indian depredation cases, which require an appropriation for their payment (H. Doc. No. 1178); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a judgment rendered against the Government by the district court of the United States for the district of Maryland, under the provisions of the act of August 9, 1916 (H. Doc. No. 1179); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. MONTAGUE, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12179) extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near the city of Fairmont, W. Va., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 670), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. CRAGO, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3735) to provide for enlistments in the National Guard of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 671), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. DENT: A bill (H. R. 12509) providing extra compensation for work done for the War Department by certain employees thereof during the time for which leave of absence is granted by law; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SISSON: A bill (H. R. 12510) to tax the manufacture and sale of deadly weapons, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CAREW (by request): A bill (H. R. 12511) to amend the Federal income-tax law approved September 8, 1916, as amended October 3, 1917, to provide for the encouragement of home building and housing by cooperation; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. RUCKER: A bill (H. R. 12512) to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department,' approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally refered as follows:

By Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee: A bill (H. R. 12513) granting an increase of pension to Henry S. Robert; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CAREW: A bill (H. R. 12514) granting a pension to Margeret F. Gallagher; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. COSTELLO: A bill (H. R. 12515) granting a pension to Elizabeth Harmoning; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DOREMUS: A bill (H. R. 12516) granting a pension to Pierre L. Carmouche; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12517) granting a pension to Sophia Bruder; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi: A bill (H. R. 12518) for the relief of the Davis Construction Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Resolution of the National Society of Sons of the American Revolution, asking that German-language publications be discontinued; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, resolutions of a mass meeting held in the largest church in Piedmont, Mo., and of the delegate convention of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Lorain County, Ohio, urging prohibition during the period of the war; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also (by request), resolution of the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, asking that the teaching of the German language in the public schools be discontinued; to the Committee on Education.

Also (by request), petition of citizens of Centralia, Mo., protesting against the zone system of postage for periodicals and asking for its repeal; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also (by request), petition of F. P. Wood, osteopathic physician, St. Louis, Mo., favoring House bill 5407; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BROWNING: Petition of 284 citizens of Collingswood, N. J., urging Nation-wide prohibition during the period of the war; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin: Petitions of residents of Oconomowoc, Ixonia, La Prairie, and Turtle; members of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Shopiere, Brookfield, Pewaukee, Elkhorn, and Clinton Junction; members of the Congregational Church at Evansville; members of the Baptist Church at Union Grove and Elkhorn; members of Lodge No. 322, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Milton; members of Women's Study Circle, Orfordville; and members of Student Defense Council of Madison, all in the State of Wisconsin, asking that legislation be enacted by Congress to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors during the war; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ELSTON: Memorial of the Shipyard Riggers' Union, No. 15678, of Oakland, Cal., favoring repeal of zone-rate postal legislation; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. LINTHICUM: Memorial of the Baltimore Federation of Labor, urging the passage of House bill 123; to the Committee on Labor.

Also, petition of Edwin T. Daneker, of Baltimore, Md., urging the immediate passage of House bill 6421; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, resolution of the Baltimore clearing house and letters of the American Bank of Baltimore and of the Farmers & Merchants National Bank, protesting against the passage of Senate bill 4426; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Also, petition of Dr. Robert R. Keiningham, of Baltimore, urging the passage of House bill 5407; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of George B. Sammons, Baltimore, Md., favoring increased pay for pressmen in the Government Printing Office; to the Committee on Appropriations.

Also, petition of W. P. Summers, of Baltimore, Md., favoring the Jones amendment to the food-emergency bill; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of the International Bedding Co. and the Diamond Pillow, Feather & Down Co., both of Baltimore, and Evans Bros., of Elkton, Md., protesting against the repeal of the second-class mail provisions of the war-revenue act; and of H. W. Porter, of Baltimore, Md., asking for the repeal of this legislation; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of Guy K. Mitchell, of Baltimore, urging partial payments of income and excess-profits taxes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MAGEE: Petition of Mr. Charles T. Brockway, of Syracuse, N. Y., favoring the early passage of a war prohibition measure; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of Rev. A. F. Brown and others, of Pompey, N. Y., favoring the early passage of a war prohibition measure; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of the East Syracuse Woman's Christian Temperance Union, for the passage of a bill to prohibit the use of foodstuffs for the manufacture of intoxicating liquors and to limit all intoxicating liquors now on hand to nonbeverage purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BAKER: Resolution adopted by the Newhall and Saugus Branch of the Red Cross, asking for war prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition signed by the majority of the representative people of Quincy, Cal., protesting against the zone system; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of First Baptist Church, Malone, N. Y., favoring the prohibition of the beverage liquor traffic during the period of the war as a war measure; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of United Presbyterian Church, Lisbon, N. Y., for the passage of a bill to prohibit effectively the use of any kind of foodstuffs during the war for the manufacture of intoxicating beverages and to limit all intoxicating liquors now on hand to nonbeverage uses; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 20, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, at this sacred moment dedicated to the thought of God, we bow in Thy presence to lift our hearts to Thee for Thy guidance this day. Thou hast been pleased to call these Thy servants into a place of ever-increasing responsibility, facing problems unsolved and which will yield their secret only to men whose hearts are right toward Thee. Grant us this day Thy guidance and blessing, that we may do all things according to Thy will and advance the interests of Thy kingdom through the work of the day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. ASHURST and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I am instructed by the Committee on Woman Suffrage to give notice that a week from to-day or as soon thereafter as the parliamentary situation will permit some member of the Woman Suffrage Committee will move to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 200) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States conferring upon women the right of suffrage.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Would it not be well to have the Senator give notice that the joint resolution will be called up upon a certain day, because if that notice is not given Senators will not know whether it is going to be brought up or not. There is no business before the Senate now which is so pressing that the vote can not be taken upon the day for which the notice will be given. I wish the Senator would give a notice, and that would be a notice to Senators who want to vote for it to be here and to those who want to vote against it to be here, and there will be no excuse for not taking the vote on that day.

Mr. HOLLIS. I gave the instruction of the committee exactly as it was given to me. The matter was thoroughly considered by the committee and it was supposed that there would be nothing in the way so that the joint resolution could be taken up a week from to-day, which will be next Thursday. It is the intention of the committee to have the chairman if he is here, if not to have the vice chairman, move to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution on Thursday of next week, a week from to-day.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I regret exceedingly that the committee has come to the decision which it has reached on this subject. I am interested in the joint resolution and would like very much to be present to vote for it when it comes up, but after to-morrow night it will be impossible for me to be here within the next two weeks. Arrangements have been made affecting sickness in my family which I must meet. I had not supposed that there was any thought of bringing the matter up at this session of Congress, from what has been said heretofore.

I do not know that I should have made any arrangements if I had been notified in advance, but I repeat, I am exceedingly sorry that in a matter which is evidently going to be discussed it will not be possible for me to be present within that time.

Mr. HOLLIS. The committee very carefully considered the matter of absences, and the reason why they decided to ask for a vote as early as next week, Thursday, is that so many Senators are planning to go away about the 1st of July. The committee wanted the Senate to have fair notice, so that everyone might be present and vote for or against the measure. It seemed wise to us to put it before the 1st of July, and to put it before the end of the week, so that there might be a day or two for discussion in case there is discussion. I notified one who may be considered the leader on the other side yesterday, and he told me he thought we could agree practically not to have much discussion but to vote next week, Thursday. I believe myself that that can be brought about. I think there will be a few speeches, perhaps, on both sides, but no intention to filibuster.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Just for a moment. There is one Senator who is a very earnest advocate of this proposed amendment to the Constitution who is absent many miles, and is very likely to be away at that time. If we are to vote on Thursday, I wish to telegraph him, he having a long distance to come.

Mr. HOLLIS. If the committee is able to bring about a vote next Thursday, it will do so, and it has every reason to think that it can.

Mr. ASHURST. The only point is whether I can notify him that a vote will be taken on that day.

Mr. HOLLIS. I think both sides have about decided to vote on that day.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have just come into the Chamber. I understand the Senator from New Hampshire is simply giving a notice. He is not asking an agreement now to vote at any time?

Mr. HOLLIS. I am not.

In this connection, Mr. President, I desire to read a resolution passed by the American Federation of Labor at its annual convention at St. Paul, June 14, 1918:

Resolution passed by the American Federation of Labor at St. Paul, June 14, 1918.

Whereas the American Federation of Labor and its affiliated bodies have repeatedly urged upon the legislators of this country the essential justice and economic need of equal suffrage for women and men; and

Whereas the military needs of the country are drawing millions of men out of industry and women are filling their places; and

Whereas this substitution of voteless women for voting men inflicts upon us, the working people of the Nation, an acute injustice by cutting down our voting strength and our share in the control of our Government: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled considers this injustice no longer tolerable and demands in behalf of the working people of the United States that the United States Senate take immediate action to enfranchise the women of this Nation by passing the Federal women's suffrage amendment now pending in that body.

Though not directly related but somewhat connected with this matter I also wish to put in the RECORD a telegram from St. Paul, dated June 19, 1918:

ST. PAUL, MINN., June 19, 1918.

Hon. HENRY F. HOLLIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

American Federation Labor now in convention here unanimously adopted following resolution:

"Whereas 4,000 women operatives employed in the United States Bureau of Engraving and Printing at Washington are paid but $1.92 to $2.24 per day; and

"Whereas this scale represents for the majority of these women no increase for 15 years, although the pay of the greater portion of the male forces of the bureau has been increased since the war began and the pay of the women operatives is less than the wage paid to unskilled male labor in the bureau; and

"Whereas the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the President of the United States have recommended that Congress appropriate sufficient funds to bring the pay of the women operatives up to the minimum of $920 per year: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the thirty-eighth annual convention of the American Federation of Labor hereby urges upon Congress the importance of bringing the wage scale of Government departments into conformity"——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I make a point of order against the reading of these things into the RECORD. I was not here at the beginning. I do not know what it is, and it is immaterial to the Committee on Printing what it is, but I object to its being printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I have not yielded the floor, and I desire to read this telegram.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is in the morning hour, and I make the point of order that it can not be done.

Mr. HOLLIS. No objection was made to the reading, and I will merely finish it.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. On the point of order, the Senator from New Hampshire was giving a notice on behalf of a committee, and in connection with that he read a resolution or statement of the American Federation of Labor. He is now, I understand, reading a similar statement. He is not offering petitions, as I understand it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I know, and in the morning hour you can not put into the RECORD even the resolution to which the Senator refers unless by unanimous consent and by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will yield to me——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair decides that the point of order made by the Senator from Arizona is well taken. The resolution under which we have had recent decisions by the President of the Senate is that no other portion of such communications shall be inserted in the RECORD except that provided in the rule, and, of course, the reading by a Senator is the insertion in the RECORD and therefore it is not in order.

Mr. HOLLIS. There is no doubt about the rule. I shall put it in the RECORD some time during the day. I appeal to the Senator from Arizona to allow unanimous consent for me to finish it. There are only about 10 lines left.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not object to the reading, but I object to the printing in the RECORD.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator can read it later.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I must demand the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the presentation of petitions and memorials.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 12100) to amend the act approved September 7, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a United States Shipping Board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States; and for other purposes."

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CUMMINS. I present a petition in the form of a resolution and being very brief I will read it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I demand the regular order and object to reading in the RECORD of any resolution in the morning hour.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Arizona insists upon his objection I have a right to describe briefly and succinctly the nature of the resolution or the petition I now present.

Mr. LODGE. Under the ruling of the Chair I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

Mr. CUMMINS. I present a petition in the form of a resolution by the military nurses of the State of Iowa in behalf of the Susan B. Anthony suffrage amendment and begging that the Senate shall take prompt and favorable action upon it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have a telegram in the nature of a petition from the governor of the State of Colorado and from all the State officers of the State of Colorado urging the immediate passage of the Susan B. Anthony amendment.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Pattern Makers' Association, of San Franciso, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide 30 days' leave of absence to employees in the navy yards of the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the Presbyterian Church of Gilroy, Cal., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KNOX presented a memorial of Congressional District Group No. 1, of Philadelphia County, Pa., remonstrating against the delay in bringing the Federal woman-suffrage amendment to a vote in the Senate, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HALE presented a memorial of the Maine National Bankers' Association, of Rumford, Me., remonstrating against the guaranty of certain bank deposits in national banks, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 4727) to authorize the payment to the Government of France of $13,511.13 as an indemnity requested in behalf of Madame Crignier for losses sustained by her as the result of a search for the body of Admiral John Paul Jones (Rept. No. 517); and

A bill (S. 4728) to authorize the payment of $2,000 to the Government of Japan for the benefit of the family of Tatsuji Saito, a Japanese subject killed at Camp Geronimo, Mexico, May 25, 1916 (Rept. No. 518).

Mr. McNARY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 2494) to provide for the exchange with the State of Oregon of certain school lands and indemnity rights within the national forests of that State for an equal area of national forest land, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 519) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 4735) to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to certify certain findings of fact, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MARTIN:

A bill (S. 4736) for the relief of Richard J. Easton; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A bill (S. 4737) granting a pension to Joseph J. Horan (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LEWIS:

A bill (S. 4738) to acquire by purchase certain coal lands in West Virginia, contiguous and tributary to the lines of the Virginian Railway Co., to be developed and operated by the Government; and to acquire by purchase the Virginian Railway Co.'s property, to be operated by the Government, to insure a certain and ample coal supply for the Army and Navy and to insure prompt and adequate transportation facilities for the same, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $90,000 for the construction and equipment of a lighthouse depot at Ketchikan, Alaska, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KENYON submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of War to sell at not less than an appraised valuation, to be fixed by three disinterested persons appointed by him, the property now known as Meridian Hill Park, on Sixteenth Street, city of Washington, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANSDELL submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $200,000 to investigate the reclamation of drainage lands outside existing reclamation projects, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SEED GRAIN.

Mr. CURTIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS FOR STATE MILITIA.

Mr. KNOX (for Mr. PENROSE) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3547) to extend the provisions of the pension act of May 11, 1912, to the officers and enlisted men of all State militia and other State organizations that rendered service to the Union cause during the Civil War for a period of 90 days or more, and providing pensions for their widows, minor children, and dependent parents, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no further morning business, the morning business is closed.

Mr. HARDWICK. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the immediate consideration of Senate resolution 260. It is simply a resolution directing the Committee on Immigration to provide for its hearings. I think no Senator will object to it.

There being no objection, the resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Immigration, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to employ a stenographer, at a cost not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, and that expenses contracted hereunder shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

REVOCATION OF LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that the leave of absence granted to me by the Senate about four weeks ago on account of sickness in my family be revoked.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, it will be so ordered.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 12100. An act to amend an act approved September 7, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a United States Shipping Board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States; and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS' RETIRED LIST.

Mr. TOWNSEND. As the morning business is closed, I move that the unfinished business, Senate bill 130, be laid before the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I desire to call up for consideration a bill reported from the Judiciary Committee yesterday. I think it may be disposed of during the morning hour. It is an important measure. If the Senator will consent to temporarily lay aside the bill which he has just called the attention of the Senate to, I should like to have that bill disposed of.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The only particular interest I have in the matter now is that there are a great many Senators who would like to have the pending bill disposed of, as there is something else they wish to attend to, and I thought we might possibly dispose of the unfinished business. If the Senator wanted to speak, I thought possibly he could do that now, and we could thus dispose of the bill, and then have time to take up the Senator's bill or any other measure the Senate wished to take up.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. During the morning hour is it not the right of the Senator from Utah to move to take up any bill without regard to the unfinished business?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have moved to take up Senate bill 130, which is the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan was recognized and moved to take up Senate bill 130.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, he made the motion first.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But I do not want to be discourteous. I want to accommodate myself to the Senator from Utah and other Senators. My thought has been that we could dispose of the bill before the Senate much more quickly if we should commence at once than if we delayed it for other business to intervene.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Michigan yield to me for a moment, that I may make an inquiry of the Senator from Utah? Is the bill to which the Senator has just referred and which he desires to bring up the bill from the Judiciary Committee relating to condemnation?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. With regard to that bill, I want to say that with its purposes generally I am in entire sympathy, but I have not seen a printed copy of it yet.

Mr. KING. It is on the Senator's desk.

Mr. CUMMINS. It must have been put on my desk this morning.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. There will be a very important amendment to propose to the bill and I have not had an opportunity to prepare it. The Senator from Utah knows in a general way what the amendment is. I hope he will not bring on the bill for consideration until Senators can have a chance to examine and study it, so that they may appreciate the value or want of value of the amendment which will be proposed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, out of deference to the request of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], I shall not ask that the bill to which I have referred be now taken up; but I desire the Senator to be advised that as soon as the measure for which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] asks consideration is out of the way, even though it be at a late hour this afternoon, I shall move to take up for consideration the bill to which I have referred and which the Senator refers to. I think we can dispose of it within a short time.

I might say, in passing, that the bill authorizes individuals, associations, or corporations to exercise the right of eminent domain for the purposes of supplying the Government, or those who may be engaged in furnishing the Government war supplies or in Government work, with electric energy. There are hundreds if not thousands of plants owned by private persons or by corporations that are producing war supplies. They require electric power. In some instances they produce their own power, but in most cases they obtain the electricity to run their plants from power companies. There are a number of States in which the authority to condemn for power purposes is not given. While it is true that there are electric power companies operating within such States, and transmission lines have been constructed, all rights of way for such purposes have been secured by purchase, and when the owner refuses to sell, either the land, or grant an easement, the power company is halted in its plans or it has to abandon them. In those States, I regret to state, selfish persons are now holding up the Government and are holding up power corporations that are perfectly willing to furnish additional power to the Government, or to plants engaged in governmental activities, by charging such exorbitant prices for rights of way over their land that action is impossible.

The bill provides that the right of eminent domain shall be exercised only during the present war, and then only after the Secretary of War shall approve of the undertaking after he shall find that the generation or transmission of electric power is necessary to increase the supply of power for the governmental objects to which I have referred. Senators can see the importance of it, because very important work is now being halted by reason of the inability to acquire power.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in order that there may be a general understanding of the subject, I may be permitted to say that, so far as I know, no member of the committee has any objection to—in fact, they are all in favor of—the proposed condemnation in order to furnish the power to State corporations that are doing Government work. The point that will have to be considered, however, is as to whether, as against the laws of the States, the privilege of using the land after the war ceases and after these corporations cease to do work for the Government shall continue; that is to say, whether the Government will authorize the condemnation of lands or other property to be enjoyed by private corporations after the Government's use has entirely ceased. That is the only point, so far as I recall, upon which there is difference of opinion amongst the members of the committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 130, being what is known as the volunteer officers' retirement bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not wish to object, but I should be glad again to call the attention of the Senate to the importance of instructing its conferees on the Agricultural appropriation bill with regard to $2.50 wheat. We are tied up, and we think we can not bring the conference report back to the Senate because a majority of the Senate conferees will not agree to bring it back. The only way out of the difficulty is for the Senate to instruct its conferees what to do. I have reached the conclusion that we can not pass the provision for $2.50 wheat, and, in order to save the Agricultural bill, the wise course is simply to instruct the conferees on the part of the Senate to yield. In view, however, of the fact that the Senator from Michigan has only until 4 o'clock for the consideration of his bill, I shall not press my request at this time; but after that bill shall have been voted upon this afternoon I shall again endeavor to bring before the Senate the subject to which I have referred.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 130, being the unfinished business.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 130) to create in the War Department and the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as the "Civil War volunteer officers' retired list," to authorize placing thereon with retired pay certain surviving officers who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the Civil War, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am in favor of the bill which has just been laid before the Senate and which has been reported by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], and I intend to vote for it. However, I do not propose to consume time in advocating it, but I merely wish to ask that a protest relating to the subject of the notice of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], which I was unable to present owing to the vigilance of my friend the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], be printed as a part of my remarks at this time. I shall not ask to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Chair hears none.

The protest referred to is as follows:

WINCHESTER, MASS., June 18, 1918.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR LODGE: The Unitarian women of the Winchester Branch of Antisuffragists ask that at the proper time you will read, or cause to be read, in the Senate Chamber the following statement and protest:

At the close of a long session of a business meeting of the American Unitarian Association, May 21, when many delegates had left the meeting, a resolution was passed by a small majority of the remaining delegates urging the United States Senate to vote for the Susan B. Anthony amendment.

The Unitarian women belonging to the Winchester Branch of Massachusetts Antisuffragists, numbering about one-fifth of the 350 members, strongly protest against this resolution. Their reasons are threefold: They believe the amendment itself is unconstitutional in its attempt to override State rights and majority rule; they believe it most unpatriotic to try to force upon our country now, in its time of stress, a measure that would not only embarrass the Government by bringing 25,000,000 untrained voters into its electorate, but would also cause an increased expenditure of many millions of dollars at every election—now when every dollar is needed for the war and war relief—and they believe the vote is not a representative vote of the American Unitarian Association.

The members—all the members of this branch of antisuffragists—desire to avail themselves of this opportunity to express, not only to our two Massachusetts Senators but to all the Members of the Senate who have taken such a firm and manly stand against the Susan B. Anthony amendment, their sincere appreciation and their warmest thanks.

Yours, with great respect,

MARIA A. PARSONS,
Publicity Committee of the Winchester Antisuffrage Branch.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the fact that at the present time there has been great effort upon the part of many men not within the proper age to secure officers' commissions in the military service. A commission as an officer of the Army of the United States is a thing greatly to be desired, and I scarcely think there is a man of physical strength enough to go to war who does not desire an officer's position. I mention this in connection with the fact that the pending bill discriminates between officers and privates; but I rose not so much even to mention that as to call attention to the fact that there is no guaranty now being made and no promise of any kind now being made to the men who are seeking commissions as officers during the war in the Government service that they shall be given retired officers' pay at any time after they are mustered out.

I wish to make that statement now, that it may go into the RECORD, lest there should be any mistake about it in after years. If anyone knows of any such promise, I should like to hear it. I am sure there is none, and I am sure that the claim of a promise can not possibly be made hereafter as to the men who are now so anxious to have commissions. If I could accommodate all from my own State with commissions who desire them, I think I could fill all the commissioned places that are to be filled in the Reserve Army.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. KING resumed the speech begun by him on yesterday. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LENROOT in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. KING. I yield.

ADMISSION OF CONTRACT LABORERS.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator from Utah will yield to me for just a moment, I desire to make a brief statement to the Senate and to give a brief notice to the Senate.

Recently under a departmental order, which takes effect today, the Secretary of Labor has undertaken to repeal the contract-labor law, the literacy test, and the head-tax provisions of the immigration laws of the United States. Because of the fact that the present debate is proceeding under a unanimous-consent agreement, to come to an end at a given hour, I do not wish to inject that question into the debate; but I notify the Senate that, at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow morning, it is my intention, if I can secure the floor, to address to the Senate some remarks relating to this remarkable, unprecedented, and unjustifiable proceeding on the part of a bureau of our Government.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I do not want to encourage the Senator from Georgia to enter into the discussion, as he says he does not desire to do so, but the statement he has made is a very interesting one. How has the Secretary of Labor undertaken to do what the Senator from Georgia has stated?

Mr. HARDWICK. Under a provision of the act "the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor"—I am reading now from the act itself—"shall issue rules and prescribe conditions, including exaction of such bonds as may be necessary, to control and regulate the admission and return of otherwise inadmissible aliens applying for temporary admission."

It was intended by Congress, as the debates and hearings in both Houses all disclose, to provide for cases where an alien inadmissible here had made the trip and was sick on the ship, and humanity required that he should be temporarily allowed to land, or wanted to visit his people for a day or two—some such case as that. It is proposed to apply this proviso to thousands of contract laborers to be brought in here from Mexico.

I thank the Senator from Utah for his courtesy.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS' RETIRED LIST.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 130) to create in the War Department and the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as the "Civil War volunteer officers' retired list," to authorize placing thereon with retired pay certain surviving officers who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the Civil War, and for other purposes.

Wednesday, June 19.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it is an unpleasant task and an unpopular course to pursue, to oppose measures of this character. Indeed, I have learned that there is scarcely any proposition looking to obtaining money from the Treasury of the United States that does not meet with approval, and opposition thereto is disapproved. It is a popular "indoor sport" nowadays to devise methods to take money from the Federal Treasury. The stupendous demands made upon our country by reason of the war—demands which must be met—not only do not diminish the plans to raid the Public Treasury but apparently increase the number and augment the amounts demanded. Almost daily bills are introduced calling for appropriations reaching millions, and, indeed, hundreds of millions of dollars. Claims old and musty and which upon examination are found to be without merit and in some instances unconscionable are presented, and appropriations asked to meet them. One would think that the shadow of this great contest now hanging over us, which involves the life of this Nation and the cause of civilization, would occasion the most serious concern upon the part of public officials and compel them to examine with the utmost care every claim presented against the Government and every demand made for money taken from the people under the taxing power or resulting from loans made by the people based upon bonds which will mortgage our country for generations to come. But this paradox is presented; the more pressing are the requirements upon the Government in order to save the Nation, and the greater the appropriations for such purpose, the more numerous are the extraneous and unmeritorious demands upon the Government. It would seem as if the appetite of many persons were whetted by reason of the great appropriations made to meet the imperative demands of the war, and that satiety could only come, if it can come at all, by still larger appropriations, not required by the war, but to meet claims questionable in character or wholly devoid of merit. Perhaps it is human nature that prompts so many to make demands upon the Government, because they see the great stream of money pouring from the Treasury into so many activities and into so many channels.

I respectfully submit that the bill under consideration does not come with appealing force to the conscience of Senators, nor is it in my opinion founded upon any valid or just considerations. Apparently it is pressed now because so many claims are presented, many of which are unworthy and ignoble, and some of which are so indefensible as to make their proper characterization impossible within parliamentary limitations.

The proposition contended for by the proponents of this bill is entirely new to me. My acquaintance with the proceedings of this body and of the House of Representatives had not led me to discover that legislation of this character had ever received consideration at the hands of the Congress of the United States. Indeed, I never heard of this bill until yesterday, when the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] asked for its immediate consideration. I then obtained a copy of the bill and hastily examined it. I was astounded when I ascertained its provisions and learned what was demanded within the four corners of the measure. When I was informed that similar bills had passed both branches of Congress upon various occasions, but not during the same session, my astonishment was increased. Further examination of the bill this morning confirmed the impression which the perusal of the bill yesterday created upon my mind. It seems incredible to me that legislators charged with the weighty responsibilities resting upon Members of this body could countenance this measure. The bill to me is so shocking, so violative of every principle of justice and right, as I comprehend the meaning of those words, that it not only provokes my opposition but excites my indignation. No elaborate investigation of the bill, no careful analysis of its provisions, are necessary, in my opinion, to acquaint the most casual reading of the measure with the unjust and unrighteous provisions therein found.

There are some propositions presented to us from day to day which, as soon as they are stated, provoke an opposition, strong, intense, and uneradicable, or meet with immediate favor, dependent upon the standards and perspectives of those to whom the statements are made. Speaking generally, Mr. President, questions are frequently presented which, measured by accepted ethical standards, are to be condemned. There is nothing in this world enduring except the truth and justice and righteousness. All things else are evanescent. Men's systems of philosophy, the creeds fashioned by man, political systems, and human governments—these are exotics, the things of an hour, and go to nameless graves and are forgotten. But the principles of justice, the great moral standards revealed by God, the truths emanating from Him, quickening the consciences of men, to guide them along the pathway of life, are immutable and immortal. The same standard of justice and righteousness should govern nations as that which governs individuals. No legislation should be enacted that does not square with the highest principles of justice and righteousness and with the highest ethical and moral precepts. The cause of the present war is found in Germany's cynical and callous disregard of this view and her insistence that the State is subject to no moral restraints and may not be controlled by any ethical standards. One great German writer has said that questions of right and justice are for individual conduct but have no relation to the conduct or activities of the State. Germany has displayed a brutal and cynical disregard of the fundamental principles of justice that underlie all things that are enduring.

As stated, there are some propositions presented to us in life which seem so unjust, so lacking in merit, that our opposition to them is immediately aroused. Of course, I do not claim to be governed by any higher standards than those observed by other Senators or the citizens of our land, and in my opposition to this bill I do not want to offend those who differ from me or to question their motives or sincerity or impute to them any views less worthy than those which I entertain. It may be that my opposition to this bill is unwarranted and that my judgment as to its merits is without proper support. It is possible that I am viewing the proposition from an improper standpoint and that there are phases of this question which I have not been able to comprehend, but I confess that I can see no merit in the bill, and judging it by the ordinary standards of right and wrong, as I try to understand those standards, the bill is not only devoid of merit but it is wrong and unjust and should be overwhelmingly defeated.

What is the proposition contained in this bill? Baldly and nakedly stated, it is this: That men who volunteered for military or naval service during the Civil War and served for a limited period of time and were mustered out of service, or separated themselves from service by resignation or otherwise, and returned to their homes, to their business pursuits, and to the activities of citizenship, and who, from that time until the present, have been engaged in private pursuits providing a competency for themselves and their families and not subject in any way to the military or naval control of the United States, are now to be regarded and treated as though they had been withdrawn from their business pursuits and their private work and labor, and had been under the military or naval service of the Government and had been giving all their time and their talents to military and naval activities; and are to now be placed upon the retired list as officers and receive the same retired pay and other benefits as are provided for officers who have given their entire lives to their country. In other words, those who have been engaged in civil life, devoting their energies to their own work and labor, and to their own aggrandizement, and to the building up of their own fortunes, are to receive a gratuity from the Government and to be placed upon the same footing as those who have given their entire lives to their country, and who as boys went into the Military and Naval Academies of our country, turning their backs upon all of the opportunities that this great Republic offered in order to serve their country. Years ago our Government established a Military and a Naval Academy and limited the number of young men who were to be received and trained therein for military and naval service in our country. It is true, we have been a democratic and peace-loving people and have abhored war and all of the evils which it produces. We have not believed in a large standing Army, or in imposing militarism upon the people of this Republic. Our people were devoted to the arts of peace and our Nation looked out upon the warring nations of the world with the deepest regret, with the hope that peace and concord would come to nations, and with a desire to escape the conflagrations which have enveloped so many nations of the earth. Perhaps we have loved peace so much that we were deaf to the calls of duty and failed to properly prepare against an evil day and the assaults of a powerful and unscrupulous foe. Looking back now upon the past, many of our people believe we have been wanting in wisdom and vision, and that we failed to make such preparations for the defense of this Republic as prudence and wisdom dictated.

I do not intend to discuss the question of whether we have been guilty of omissions in this regard, and whether, if we had been better prepared for war, this great contest might have been avoided. People, perhaps, will always differ upon this question, and no good can result, at least at this hour, from a discussion of it. But I allude to the matter because it is germane to the point I am now attempting to make.

Though we were a pacific Nation, we provided the skeleton of an army. It was regarded as imperative that naval and military officers should be trained and brought to a high state of efficiency. Our Military and Naval Academies have always ranked high and the young men who have gone from these institutions have reflected honor upon our country. They have shown themselves to be gallant and able officers both in peace and in war, both on land and upon sea.

The policy of our Nation was to select a limited number of young men and have them trained in these academies. Those who went there realized, upon entering these institutions, that they were bidding good-by to the great opportunities this Nation held out for young men of the Republic. They knew that they were withdrawing themselves from the broad fields of opportunity that were spread out to be occupied by the energetic and virile young men of the Republic. Looking back upon the history of those who have entered the Naval and Military Academies of our country during the past three-quarters of a century it must be admitted that they made sacrifices in leaving their homes and families and friends and ties of youth and the avenues so numerous threading this Republic—avenues leading to wealth and distinction and honor.

I hope it is not an improper comparison to allude to those who have withdrawn themselves from the activities of life and, taking upon themselves priestly vows, have consecrated their lives to religious service and to the obligations of their church; and many noble women have also denied themselves those joys and the supreme happiness resulting from family unions, and have consecrated their lives to religious service and charity and to deeds of love and tenderness. As stated, perhaps this is not a happy comparison, and yet it illustrates, though imperfectly, the point I am attempting to make. The young men who went to the Military and Naval Academies and thereafter took part in the Civil War made sacrifices which many of us do not comprehend when they left their homes and dedicated their lives and all that they had to this Republic. We are all familiar with the situation of our country immediately before the Civil War. Then, as since, the opportunities afforded by our country to energetic young men were unequalled in any land or in any age. The resources of our Republic had scarcely been touched, new States were to be founded, and empires were to be built within the limits of the United States. Every young man of ambition knew that in the great field of opportunity there were wealth and fame and honor and distinction in store for all. Yet, as stated, the young men who went to these institutions of learning just before the days of the Civil War closed the doors of success and wealth and fortune and glorious opportunity upon themselves, and offered their lives and all that they had to their country. They served through the dark years of the Civil War and proved that they were worthy representatives of a great and free people. When the war was over most of them felt that they could not in honor resign their positions in the Army and in the Navy and enter into the activities of civil life. Moreover, their training had fitted them for military and naval careers. In a way their education had not fitted them for civil life, but had prepared them for service in the Army and in the Navy. We all appreciate that immediately following the Civil War the business opportunities presented in our country were very great. In all parts of the land there was development and progress; wealth and prosperity came to the people, and the young men who had entered the Civil War, coming from civil life, quickly returned to their homes and engaged in the business pursuits and in the business undertakings which brought to them and to our country prosperity and wealth. I do not mean to contend that the officers who came from the military academies of the United States were more valiant or patriotic than those who entered the Army from the walks of life. Every American is filled with pride at the chapter of our country's history which records the heroic deeds of the young men who left the field, and farm, and shop, and the business pursuits in which they were engaged, and volunteered their services in defense of the flag. All honor is due the brave men who entered the Army and saved our country from disunion. In the great Army that was formed during the Civil War thousands of officers were raised from the ranks. Many of them were mere boys when they entered the Army, but they had, for the time being, given up their pursuits and callings in order that they might serve their country. It would be, of course, improper to say that their services were less distinguished or less valuable than those of the officers who came from West Point and Annapolis.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator feel that those young men who had no assistance from the Government, who through their own energy, their own patriotism in a bloody conflict won their spurs and their official recognition, should be less recognized than those who were educated solely at the expense of the Government and without any expense to themselves? Are they less entitled to meritorious consideration?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before I conclude I think I can satisfy the distinguished Senator who has just interrogated me as to my views with respect to the question that he has just propounded; but permit me to say that the question as I interpret it seems to have a sting in the end of it and seems to carry, as I think, an unjust insinuation against the boys who were educated, to use the Senator's expression, "solely at the expense of the Government and without any expense to themselves." Mr. President, I repeat, that the young men who have gone to the Military and Naval Academies have denied themselves opportunities which were open to them and which have been seized by the other young men of our country. As I have stated, America has been and is the land of opportunity. Our Nation possessed inexhaustible resources, and to the young men of industry and ambition success was certain. The undeveloped resources of our Nation afforded boundless opportunities for the American people in the fields of industry and civil life. As suggested, the young men who went to the Military and Naval Academies knew what opportunities they were denying to themselves. They knew that in a democracy, in a peaceful nation, those engaged in the military service occupied positions that are not desired by most of the people and are envied by but few. The Senator's question seems to imply a criticism of those who were educated for military and naval service at the expense of the Government. I might with propriety reply that under our public school system nearly all of the children of our land are educated at the expense of the Government. The States impose heavy taxes for educational purposes and the children are educated at the expense of the taxpayers of the States; so if there is criticism to be leveled against the officers who are educated by our Government there would be legitimate ground for criticism of practically all of the young men and women who receive their educational training in our country. Even the universities are supported, at least most of them, by taxation, and those who receive the benefit of such universities are "educated at the expense of the State." Of course, those who are trained at West Point and Annapolis are educated by the Federal Government.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me say to the Senator that he does me not so much an injustice as he does himself an injustice in construing my remark to the effect that those who had won their spurs by their own efforts, without assistance from the Government, were entitled at least to equal credit at the close of a great war with those who were educated by the Government, as being a disrespectful statement or a thrust at those who were so educated. I know that the Senator down in his own heart does not think that any such intention could be charged to me.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I can afford to do myself an injustice. I can not afford to do the distinguished Senator from North Dakota or anybody else an injustice, but I certainly interpreted his remark as a delicate thrust at those who had been educated at West Point by our country.

Mr. President, I come back again to what I was stating a moment ago, namely, that I think those young men who have denied themselves the opportunities afforded in this great Republic for business success, for professional advancement or political preferment, for wealth, and for honorable station in the business and social activities of our Republic, and have gone to West Point and immured themselves—because that has been their position in the past—in the Army, and have condemned themselves to isolation, to the occupation of little forts here and there in Indian districts and in outlying sections of our country during the past 50 and more years, are entitled to consideration and to all the praise that may be given to men of brave and self-sacrificing character.

Of course, I am not derogating from the credit due the young men who volunteered for service in the Civil War and who rose to positions of trust and responsibility in the Army or in the Navy. As I have stated, they gave valiant and patriotic service to their country. No doubt they fought as well and served their country as valiantly as did the officers graduated from West Point and from Annapolis, but I am insisting that when the war was over and they returned to their homes and entered upon professional and private work, and availed themselves of all the opportunities for success, for wealth, for honor, for political preferment, and were the recipients of all of the joys and pleasures resulting from home and home ties and the duties that result from citizenship in this Republic, and from active participation in the civil and political affairs of our country, that it is unfair and unjust that they shall be entitled to the same rewards and gratuities and emoluments as the officers who continued in the service of the Government and were denied all of the advantages and privileges and opportunities possessed and enjoyed by the former.

I desire to suggest an illustration which may in a way answer the questions propounded by the Senator from North Dakota. If I may be permitted this illustration, I will assume that my honorable friend from North Dakota was old enough to have entered West Point prior to the Civil War. Assume that he forsook the opportunities which his State afforded him for business success, for political preferment, for an honorable station in the Nation; assume that he left his home and friends and all social ties and obligations; that he abandoned his home and home life—because that is involved when one enters the Army and gives his life, as an officer, to his country; assume that by this course he condemned himself to poverty, because poverty is the inevitable companion of the officers of our country; and suppose when the Civil War broke upon this Nation he was assigned to service, and that during the entire period of the war he exposed his life and gave his service upon a hundred battle fields to his country; assume further that when the war was over he continued in the service of his country, was assigned to duty at military posts in remote parts of our country, to the grinding, monotonous service that came to the officers of the Army after the war was over; assume still further that he continued in the military line of service until the day for retirement came, and that during all of these years the hand of the Government was upon him, that he was denied every opportunity for political preferment or to engage in any business that would enable him to amass a competency for his old age, and when his service in the Army was ended he was left without home, without means, without profession, without support, except the small pittance paid by the Government; now assuming all the matters herein stated to be facts in the case, and I am briefly stating the situation as it is found in the lives of substantially all of the officers of the Regular Army, will anyone who possesses a spirit of justice say that the Senator should be regarded in exactly the same light as I should be regarded if I met the situation presented in the following assumed case: Assume that when the Senator went to West Point as a youth, I refused an appointment to that institution but entered upon a business career; that after the Civil War broke out I volun-feered and entered the Army, and in due time was promoted and received a commission as an officer; that I did my duty until the war was ended and then resigned my commission and returned to my home and took up my interrupted business career; suppose that I was blessed with a home and all of the joys resulting from that great gift and all the ties connected with it; that I participated in the civil and political affairs of my city and county and State, and for more than 50 years continued my business activities and secured a competency, and that now a bill is presented which has for its object the placing of my name alongside that of my distinguished friend's, who had given so many years of his life to his country, and which also sought to give me the same retired pay, or gratuity, whatever the term may be, as that which the Government under the law gives to him.

Does the Senator think that it would be just and fair and right that a measure of such a character should receive approval? I confess that the proposition to me is monstrous, and yet that is just what this bill seeks to accomplish. Speaking for myself, I should be ashamed if I were in the position just referred to to ask for or receive from the Government of the United States the benefits and gratuities provided in the pending measure.

Thursday, June 20, 1918.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, yesterday, before I had finished what I desired to say concerning the bill under consideration, I yielded the floor, intending to resume at a later time. An agreement has been reached under which a vote will be had upon this bill during the day. I appreciate that there is a determination to force this bill through the Senate, and that many Senators have determined to support it. It may be that any efforts that I may put forth to defeat it will be unavailing. I am persuaded, however, that the sound and sober judgment of the great majority of the Members of this body is opposed to the bill. When I yielded the floor I was attempting to show why provisions of this bill were unjust and unfair, and that the entire framework of this measure could not be defended in equity or in morals. This measure, as I am advised, is not a new one. The Senator from Michigan who is demanding its passage now has been its protagonist for a decade or more. With all the zeal and earnestness which he possesses, this measure has been pushed in both branches of Congress for a number of sessions last past.

As I stated yesterday, the bill is hoary with age. It possesses no redeeming features and contains no virtues entitling it to live. The judgment of fair-minded men, in my opinion, denounce it as a criminal and convict it of offenses worthy of death. We could do no better service to-day than to execute a righteous and just sentence pronounced by a fair and just jury, and after bringing it to a well-deserved end quietly inter it in a field of dishonor.

But I am afraid that it would be a rather unusual spectacle for the Senate of the United States during this session to kill a bill calling for five or six millions of dollars for this year and large amounts annually for an indefinite period.

What is the justification for this bill?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LENROOT in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has just stated that it would cost five or six million dollars.

Mr. KING. The first year.

Mr. POMERENE. The first year. I rise to ask whether the Senator has any authentic information upon that subject? On one or two other occasions when this bill came up I inquired, and I was not at that time able to get any information as to its probable cost. There is nothing that seems to me to be reliable; and if the Senator has any definite information as to the number of the beneficiaries under the bill and as to what it will cost the Government, I would be glad to have it.

Mr. KING. In reply to my friend I will say that my information is only that which is furnished by Senators in the debate. As I stated, I never heard of this measure until yesterday. I have had little opportunity—indeed, no opportunity—to make any investigation as to the beneficiaries under this act, but I am told by the Senator who is in charge of the bill there will be approximately 8,000 beneficiaries.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I have no doubt the number will be in excess of that figure. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SMOOT. There is a complete list of the beneficiaries under the bill, and the last list published showed, I think, eight thousand two hundred and odd. That was some years ago, and if the deaths that have occurred among the retired officers is the same percentage that have occurred among the soldiers of the Civil War, there are now less than 7,000 alive in the United States.

If that be the case, taking into consideration the passage of the pension bill on the 10th of this month, the expense could not be more than $4,500,000 to $5,000,000 a year; and when you take into consideration that the average age of these officers now remaining is about 80, of course we must recognize that the death rate from now on will increase rapidly.

That is the situation as it appears as to number. As to what it is going to cost, my belief is that it will cost nearly $5,000,000 the first year. I am quite sure it will not be more than that amount.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, whether it was $1 or whether it was $10,000,000, as far as the principle is concerned, the same rule ought to determine our conduct.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator is correct, and I only made the statement in answer to the question asked by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], not in any way to have it appear that I was discussing the merits or the demerits of the bill.

Mr. KING. If my remarks conveyed the idea to my colleague that I was placing him in opposition to or in favor of the bill, I had no such intention. I do not know the views of my colleague in regard to this measure; but the point I am making is that whether the bill calls for $1 or for $10,000,000, if it is wrong it should not receive the support of the Members of this body.

No one, Mr. President, can accurately determine the number of persons who will be beneficiaries under this bill, and no one can definitely predict the amount which the Government will be called upon to annually pay if this measure shall be enacted into law. In nearly every instance estimates of what a measure will cost the Government have proven to be inaccurate and wholly misleading. It is needless to say that the Government is always the one that suffers from the inaccuracies and misleading information furnished prior to the passage of the bill.

This is particularly true of measures providing for gratuities, bounties, pensions, and drafts drawn upon the future. It is safe to say that this bill, if it shall become a law, will require, in order to meet its terms, millions of dollars annually in excess of the amounts suggested by its zealous and interested advocates.

Yesterday the able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] analyzed the specious plea made by the Senator from Michigan that this proposed legislation merely carried out a "contract" which was entered into between the United States and those who will be beneficiaries under this bill. His argument was convincing and was unanswerable. It is beyond my comprehension how able and distinguished Senators, many of whom are lawyers of ability and standing, can insist that the legislation of Congress passed in 1861 constituted a "contract" between the Government and the volunteer officers under the terms of which the latter were entitled to be retired according to their military ranks and receive retired pay in the same manner and to the same extent as officers in the Regular Army.

The Senator from Michigan says that there was a plain and specific "contract," and that under this contract the Civil War volunteer officers are entitled to be placed upon the "retired list" and receive the same emoluments or "retired pay" as is paid to "retired" Regular Army officers. Senators are familiar with these acts, but I desire to call their attention to them in order that they may understand my contention, that under no construction that can be given these acts can it be fairly or reasonably contended that they constitute a contract of the character referred to or otherwise or a promise upon the part of the Government to grant the gratuities provided for in the pending bill. Before reading the acts referred to I desire to state that I have examined the Congressional Globe, which contains the debates occurring at the time of their passage. When the act of July 22, 1861, was presented to Congress there was some discussion preceding its passage. The act passed a few days later provoked no discussion and seemed to be regarded as a proper supplement to the act of July 22. It is an accepted principle of statutory construction that where a legislative enactment is ambiguous the interpretation placed upon it at the time of its enactment by those who enacted it into law may be resorted to by the courts to aid them in reaching a proper interpretation. I insist that the two acts just referred to are free from all ambiguity. No reasonable or fair construction of these acts can support the conclusion announced by the Senator from Michigan.

There is nothing in the debates just referred to indicating that the subject of retirement was contemplated or that volunteer officers, if a retirement act ever were enacted, should receive the same consideration as officers of the Regular Army. As Senators will recall, the retirement act which the proponents of this measure now invoke, or under which they seek relief, was not passed until nearly one month after the acts of July 22 and July 25, 1861. The act of July 22, 1861, which is relied upon as the basis of the so-called "contracts," is as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates, organized as above set forth, shall in all respects be placed on the footing as to pay and allowances of similar corps of the Regular Army.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That any volunteer who may be received into the service of the United States under this act, and who may be wounded or otherwise disabled in the service, shall be entitled to the benefits which have been or may be conferred on persons disabled in the Regular service. * * *

The act of July 25, 1861, provides—

That the Volunteers authorized by this act shall be armed as the President may direct; they shall be subject to the rules and articles of war, and shall be upon the same footing in all respects with similar corps of the United States Army, and shall be mustered into the service for during the war.

It is manifest that the act of July 25 had two principal objects in view, namely, that the officers and privates organized under the act of July 22 should be subject to the rules and Articles of War, and that they should be "mustered into the service for during the war." Where is there any "promise" or "contract," express or implied, that the volunteer officers should many years thereafter be retired upon half or two-thirds pay? It is true that the first act referred to declared that the officers and the privates "shall in all respects be placed upon a similar footing as to pay and allowances as similar corps of the Regular Army."

Everyone knows that that legislative declaration was carried into effect. The volunteer officers and privates during the Civil War were placed "upon the same footing as to pay and allowances" as officers and soldiers of similar corps of the Regular Army. There was no distinction whatever and no discrimination in regard to pay and allowances as between the Volunteers and the Regulars. How can it be contended that this act was a contract for retirement 40 or 50 years thereafter, when there was no act nor no regulation in existence at the time the act was passed which provided for the "retirement" of officers or indicated that officers might be "retired" and receive part pay?

The attempt is made to rest this bill upon an alleged contract. The frenzied efforts made to distort the language of this act into a "contract" is conclusive proof that there are no equities in the bill and that neither justice nor right can be invoked in its support.

I insist that no person can successfully maintain the position that the act referred to creates a contract. The absurdity of this position, if I may be pardoned a repetition, is manifest when attention is called to the fact that there was no law upon the statute books, no provision or regulation of any character, permitting, allowing, or promising retirement of officers when the acts of July 22 and July 25 were passed. The one purpose of these measures was to mould into one army the Volunteers and the Regulars, and to give to the Volunteers while in the Army the same pay, the same allowance, the same privileges and benefits as were enjoyed by officers and soldiers of the Regular Army serving in similar corps.

There is not a suggestion in these acts that they relate to periods subsequent to the war or that they were designed to create a status for either officers or men after the war. They were enacted before the war and to determine the status of the volunteers during the war, or at least while in the military service of the Government. The position of those who insist that there was a contract is so sophistical as to become absurd. The absurdity of this contention becomes more apparent when the retirement act of August 3, 1861, is examined. It provides that any commissioned officer of the Army or the Marine Corps who becomes incapable of performing the duties of his office while in the service shall be placed upon the retired list and withdrawn from active service and command and from the line of promotion.

Section 15 of the same act provides that "any commissioned officer of the Army or Marine Corps who shall have served as such for 40 consecutive years may, upon his own application to the President of the United States, be placed upon the list of retired officers with the pay and emoluments allowed by this act."

As I understand the contention of the Senator from Michigan, volunteer officers who resigned from the Army at the conclusion of the Civil War, or were mustered out of service, and who returned to their homes and have never rendered any further military service to the Government, come within the provisions of section 15 and are treated as having served "40 consecutive years," and are therefore to be placed upon the retired list and given the same pay and emoluments as are allowed to Regular Army officers whose military service extended over a period of "40 consecutive years." The English language would be meaningless if such a position were tenable. As I have stated, the contention becomes absurd and ridiculous and can not be viewed, upon the part of rational and fair-minded persons, with any spirit of toleration.

Even the Regular Army officers were compelled under this act to serve "40 or more consecutive years" before they could obtain the benefits of the act respecting retirement. If a Regular Army officer, one who had graduated from West Point and had served through the entire Civil War and for many years thereafter, separated himself from the Army one year or one month or one day prior to the 40-year period, he would thereby cut himself off from the retirement provisions of the act. In other words, before any officer was entitled to retirement and to the emoluments bestowed upon retired officers, there had to be at least "40 years of consecutive military service."

How can it then be contended that volunteer officers who were mustered out of service at the end of the war, or who voluntarily resigned at that time or at any period before 40 years of service, are entitled to the benefits of the retirement act. If a Regular Army officer could not be retired and could not receive the retired pay given by the Government until he had 40 years or more of military service, under what pretext can the contention be made that a volunteer officer who served but a few months or but a few years and went back to civil life can be treated as having been "40 years or more" in the military service of the Government and thus be entitled to be placed upon the retired list and receive from the Government during the remainder of his life one-half or two-thirds pay? And yet the bill which we are now considering provides that all surviving officers who "served as officers in the Regular Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War and who were honorably discharged from service for disability and have not been reinstated in said service nor retired with continuing retired pay, shall, upon application duly made, be entered on said list and receive the same retired pay and other benefits, according to former rank and service"; and the bill further provides that "he shall receive out of any money in the Treasury retired pay according to his former rank and aggregating a term of service the amount thereof bearing such proportion to the retired pay herein granted to officers of the same rank for two years' service as the aggregate term of service bears to said term of two years." This compensation is to continue "during the natural life of the beneficiary and it shall be paid quarterly and shall not exceed three-fourths of the initial actual pay now received by a captain in the United States Army."

Mr. President, this bill is a flagrant attempt to raid the Treasury of the United States. As I have stated, it can not be defended upon any moral ground. Therefore the absurd contention is made that the bill is in execution of the terms of a valid "contract" made on the 22d day of July, 1861. As I am advised, not until about 10 years ago was there any thought of a contract. It must also be kept in mind that but a few of those who would be entitled to retired pay under the provisions of this act were in the Army prior to the passage of the retirement act on the 3d day of August, 1861. Inasmuch as that act specifically declared that any officer, in order to be placed upon the list of retired officers with the pay and emoluments allowed by the act, shall have served as such for 40 consecutive years, it can not be urged that those entering the Army after that date understood that there was a contract under which they might be retired and receive retired officers' pay if they separated themselves from the military service before the expiration of "40 years of consecutive service in the Army." In other words, the volunteers knew that there was no such contract when they entered the Army, and when they voluntarily retired from military service they never dreamed of a "contract" or a "sacred promise," such as is now contended.

It is a significant fact in the consideration of this subject that substantially all of those who would be beneficiaries if this bill were enacted into law have been drawing pensions from the Government for many years. They are now receiving pensions and will continue to receive them as long as they live.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I desire to ask the Senator from Utah if there are any statistics before us or were there any hearings on this bill showing the financial condition of the beneficiaries under the bill?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not advised as to that; all I have seen is the report of the committee. Of course, the claim will be made, I have no doubt, that these men who volunteered and who were glad to get the commissions are old and infirm and are proper subjects for gratuities from the Government; but there is nothing, so far as I know—there is certainly nothing which has been presented here—to indicate the financial standing of those who are embraced within this bill.

Mr. KENYON. Some of them, I presume, are very wealthy?

Mr. KING. Unquestionably. One of them, I have just been told by a Senator, has an immense fortune; and I have no doubt that suggestion is true in the case of many others.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator a further question. Are there any statistics or has he any information as to the pension which is drawn by any of these men?

Mr. KING. They are all now drawing pensions.

Mr. SMOOT. Under special acts.

Mr. KING. Many of them are drawing pensions of from $30 to $40 a month; all are entitled to pensions; and some of them are receiving pensions under private or special acts, which give some of them still larger sums.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator from Utah know how many are drawing pensions under special acts?

Mr. KING. I am not able to give my distinguished friend that information, but I can state that most of them have been drawing pensions for many years, and all are entitled to pensions under general pension laws. And, as stated, some are paid under special acts.

Mr. KENYON. I voted for this bill when it was here before, but I am not at all certain that it was a correct vote. I am very much impressed with the argument of the Senator from Utah, and I am asking solely for information.

Mr. KING. I appreciate that, and I regret that I can not give the Senator from Iowa all the information he desires. The Senator from Iowa is a fair-minded man; indeed, I believe he is one of the most conscientious men in public life. I want to submit an illustration to him, practically the same one I submitted to the Senate yesterday. I may be pardoned for this repetition because there are some Senators now present who were not in the Chamber when I spoke yesterday.

Suppose that the Senator from Iowa and the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who now honors me with his presence, had been 17 or 18 years of age when the Civil War broke out; that the Senator from Iowa had been appointed to West Point; that he abandoned home and friends and State and gave up all the prospects for a successful career in his splendid Commonwealth—a State affording great opportunities to the virile, ambitious young men of this Republic. And suppose he closed his eyes to all the opportunities for success and consecrated his life to his country; that in entering the Military Academy he renounced all political preferment, all civil success, all business or professional success, and condemned himself to a life of poverty, for that is the life which the average Army officer must lead after graduating from West Point; that when the fires of the Civil War came upon the country, he entered the Army and fought gallantly and bravely; that after the war was over he continued in military service until he was 62 years of age, serving at Indian posts in various parts of the West, living the dreary and monotonous life that the Army officers after the Civil War were compelled to lead. Suppose that now in his old age he is retired under the act of Congress and his only source of income is the "retired pay" from the Government upon which he and his wife must live, though it is but little more than a pittance. Now let me continue the illustration by presenting the other aspect of the subject. Assume that the Senator from Idaho refused to go into the Army; that is to say, he preferred to remain in civil life. He saw the splendid opportunities of his State for a successful professional career as a lawyer, as a business man. He 'prefered to remain a private citizen and to engage in the activities incident to life in this great Republic." But when the call of our country came he volunteered and the boys with whom he enlisted chose him as their lieutenant or as their captain. He fought for six months or a year during the Civil War, with the same bravery as did the distinguished Senator from Iowa. When the war was over he was mustered out, and he went back to his home town, to his home and home ties, to his family and friends, and to his interrupted business. He then prosecuted it with success, and he achieved honor and distinction in the State and in the Nation; and, if not wealth, he acquired a competency for his family in his old age.

Now a bill is before Congress to put him in the same class as the distinguished Senator from Iowa. Add to the assumed facts the further fact—because it is true with respect to both of them—that the Senator from Idaho had been drawing a pension for 25 or 30 years and the Senator from Iowa never had a pension, because he was not within the pensionable status; the Senator from Iowa could not be retired unless he stayed in the Army for 40 years.

Now we propose by this bill to place the Senator from Idaho in the same class as that in which the Senator from Iowa was placed, and to give him the same honors and emoluments as the latter. And this in utter disregard of the advantages which the Senator from Idaho has enjoyed. Now we propose to put the Senator from Idaho in the same class with the Senator from Iowa and to retire him as a general or a major and pay him a large monthly allowance as long as he lives. It is wholly immaterial that he may be wealthy and that he has no need of the pension. Can such legislation be justified?

The Regular Army officers received no pensions, and were not entitled to "retired pay" until after they had given "40 consecutive years" of their lives to military service. If these volunteer officers who have been in civil life since 1864, 1865, and 1866, and have been devoting all their energies to their own business pursuits, and in many instances have built up fortunes and obtained wealth and station, and who for perhaps 40 or 50 years have been drawing pensions, are now placed upon the retired list and made generals and majors and captains and colonels, and are paid in the same manner and to the same extent as the Regular Army officers who have given their entire lives to their country, it will be an act so indefensible, so criminally wrong, and a discrimination so glaring as to bring down upon this entire scheme the condemnation of all fair-minded men. And yet that is the bald, naked proposition presented. Why have not the proponents of this measure provided that the amounts received by those who will profit by this act from the Government in the way of pensions be returned to the Treasury before the beneficiaries under this bill are entitled to be placed upon the retired list? But, of course, such a provision would meet with relentless opposition from those who are pushing the passage of this bill. They are insisting that the Government promised to place them in the same category as the Regular Army officers, yet the Regular Army officers have not been drawing pensions for 40 or 50 years, and, as I have just stated, most of those who come within the provisions of this act have been receiving varying amounts as pensions from the Government for many years. They are unwilling to be placed in the same position as the Regular Army officers with respect to past pensions and emoluments and gratuities. They are so disinterested and fair that they want the alleged "contract" to apply in futuro only. In other words, they want favors and benefits above and beyond those bestowed upon the Regular Army officers, where it will be to their advantage; and so they have claimed pensions and received moneys which they are not willing to return to the Government, and now insist upon retirement with the same emoluments as Regular Army officers. This position is so selfish and so hiddeously ugly that it ought to be revolting to every Senator and to all fair-minded men.

A bill containing the same provisions as this one was before the Senate in 1916. The senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] presented to the Senate a letter from a volunteer soldier who had served during the Civil War. The letter is such a scathing arraignment of this bill that I desire to present it for the consideration of the Senate:

1302 TAYLOR STREET,
San Francisco, Cal., December 4, 1916.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: There is now before Congress a bill (S. 392; H. R. 386) known as the "Retired volunteer officers' bill," on which a vote is now pending in the United States Senate, but which has been postponed from time to time, by reason of objection of Senators.

I am writing to you to ask that if this bill ever comes up for passage you will vote against it. I ask this as an old soldier, who is vitally interested, and therefore has a right to a candid hearing.

I am opposed to this bill, so vehemently opposed to it that I can hardly speak calmly about it; nor can I understand how it is that the great body of the Grand Army of the Republic, and the greater body of veterans of the Civil War, can be so silent, or apathetic—unless, indeed, they do not understand.

Up to the time that this stupendous piece of treachery was concocted all veterans "stood together" and were loyal to each other, seeking legislation for the common good. Now, the comparatively small percentage who wore shoulder straps have thrown down their comrades and are seeking to make laws greatly to their own advantage, which is "class legislation."

Most of them are already receiving the highest pensions paid under present laws, viz, $30 per month. Not content with this, which is often double what humbler comrades of the rank and file are getting, they have the hardihood to project a scheme, the logic and language of which is: "To he——l with the old soldier, let him go to the home and eat beans, so we can get a retired officers' pay of $100 to $150 per month—live like retired gentlemen and throw bouquets at ourselves for our astuteness." A dastardly desertion and betrayal of the men they once honorably stood with.

As a basis and proof of my premises and prayer, I offer the following facts:

The present pension bill (Sherwood) takes into account two things—age and service—and these are, and must be, the only true foundation for all claims. Let us examine.

Have the proponents of this bill any advantage, or disadvantage by years, which needs special compensation?

None whatever. This is obvious to everybody, without argument.

Their claim, then, must rest on the assumption of "superior service." Let us see.

The company to which they belonged was recruited in the neighborhood or town where they had been schoolboys and had grown up together. When the company was full an election of officers was held. Always two or more tickets, but one successful candidate for each position—a captain and two lieutenants—not more than a shade smarter than the defeated candidates.

Being promoted to these positions they now enjoy the distinction, the honors, the authority, which accompany them.

What did they bring to these positions?

Any superior education or preparation? None whatever.

Any acquaintance with tactics? None.

Any knowledge of strategy? None.

Any familiarity with military engineering? None.

Any understanding of problems of transportation? None.

Anything about subsistence? Nothing.

Anything about clothing or sanitation? Nothing.

Anything about the school of the soldier? Nothing.

No years, or even days, were ever spent in study at a military school.

Not a dollar was ever paid as the price of qualification.

We each bought "Hardee" and began the "School of the Soldier" together.

Did they march farther or faster than their neighbor boys? They did not.

Did they endure hardships more severe than their schoolmates? They did not.

Did their counsels overcome the mighty combinations of treason? They were not asked.

Like the rest of us, they simply obeyed orders.

We stood in line while we could and ran when we had to.

As sprinters they were a good company average. When taken prisoners they were first to be exchanged.

What, then, did they do during the war which justifies this claim? Nothing.

They were abundantly paid; they thought so themselves then.

What have they done since? Nothing.

They have enjoyed the savings of those years. They followed their own interests untroubled by "orders" or "service," and 90 per cent of them have for 50 years occupied the best positions in civil life.

On what, then, in God's name, are they resting their preposterous claims?

On the ghost of an old service, exhumed after 50 years, dusted off, and revalued by a committee of interests and pressed with insulting effrontery upon a patient and long-suffering Congress.

The weapons are untrue assumptions, illogical arguments, specious reasoning clouding the real issue, and astounding and impudent persistence.

The retired Army officer spent his whole life, until his years retired him, in the service of his country.

The Volunteer officer never gave his years to the service of his country; he never was "retired"; he was mustered out with the rest of us and has followed his own sweet will as a civilian for 50 years, untrammeled by "orders," and has been at the "pie counter" most of the time.

Honorable sir, I carried, when fully equipped, about 45 pounds; the captain about one-ninth as much, and had a trunk and transportation for the rest.

My Belgian rifle weighed 14 pounds, exclusive of ammunition; his beautiful sword, one-ninth as much.

For this service I received $13 per month; he received nine times that amount and garnered the honors—and feminine smiles—"When knighthood was in flower."

He was fully paid when in service; when that ceased his claim ceased as completely and permanently as mine.

If he has further claim, so have I, and not in ratio of 1 to 9, but equal.

Let me beseech you, in the name of fair dealing, to vote against and defeat this bill.

H. E. WORCESTER,
Company B, Eighteenth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry.

Since this letter was written another pension act has been passed which greatly increases the amounts paid to those who were called into military service during the Civil War. Under the recent act large pensions were provided for all who had served 90 days or more in the Civil War. It was not necessary that they should have done military duty or have been within a thousand miles of any battle field. It is well known that several hundred thousand men were drafted a few months before the close of the war. Many of them served but a few days or a few months. Most of them were utilized in guarding transportation lines in sections remote from the battle lines. The act referred to does not require that in order to obtain its benefits a person should have been wounded or have incurred any disabilities while in service. The mere fact that he was in the military service of the United States for 90 days or more was sufficient to give him a pensionable status. So volunteer officers who went back to private life after the war are included within the general pension laws and are receiving the additional benefits provided in the measure which recently became a law. Moreover, many of the volunteer officers are receiving special pension of varying amounts, and, as I stated a few moments ago, the great majority of the 8,000 or more who will be provided for under this bill have been receiving pensions from the Government for many years.

The writer of the letter which I have presented employs this striking sentence:

> The volunteer officer never gave his years to the service of his country; he never was retired; he was mustered out with the rest of us and has followed his own sweet will as a civilian for 50 years, untrammeled by "orders," and has been at the "pie counter" most of the time.

Of course, as to the accuracy of the statement that the volunteer officer has been at the "pie counter" I am unable to state, and I can not indorse the criticism. If the volunteer officers have held various official positions, and I know that many of them have, there certainly was nothing improper in so doing. Indeed, the American people properly recognized the service of both volunteer officers and men, and when they reentered private life they were often placed in high official positions, not only in the States in which they resided, but also in the Nation.

The writer of the letter presents a suggestion that must have occurred to all who have given this matter any consideration. He calls attention to the fact that the volunteer officers, in many instances at least, were selected by their associates who belonged to and were recruited in the same neighborhood as that in which they resided, and that the officers brought no more superior preparations for military service to their positions than their companions and friends who enlisted as privates. They had the honors which the officer's commission entitled them to and the increased emoluments resulting from their higher positions in the Army. They retired when the war was over to their homes and engaged in business pursuits, as did the privates. There is no more reason, according to the logic of Pvt. Worcester, why the volunteer officers should now be retired and paid large gratuities from the Treasury, than his boyhood friends and associates who served as faithfully as he did. Pvt. Worcester evidently is acquainted with the arguments used to support this measure, because he states that—

May there not be some truth in his statement that this bill presents "The ghost of an old service, exhumed after 50 years * * * pressed with insulting effrontery upon a patient and long-suffering Congress"? The writer of the letter indicates that "a committee of interests" are pressing this legislation. I presume he means that there is an organization, composed of those who will be beneficiaries under this bill, which is demanding that this bill shall be enacted into law. It is possible, Mr. President, that there is an organization powerful enough to drive through Congress this unjust and iniquitous bill. It is possible that those who are to profit by this bill are sufficiently potential to secure legislation which has for eight long years been denied by Congress.

Is there any intelligent person who believes that if this measure were not supported by those who will be beneficiaries under its terms, and Congress were left without being influenced or appealed to in any manner to pass this bill, that it would receive a single vote? My opinion is that it would not only be unsupported, but no Senator or Representative would introduce it. But the desire of these eight thousand or more volunteer officers, who have not been connected with the military service of the Government for more than 50 years, and who have given their energies during that period to their own affairs, to have their names entered on the retired list as of the highest rank held by them during their service more than half a century ago, as generals, colonels, majors, captains, and lieutenants, and to receive from the Public Treasury the emoluments provided in this bill, becomes a driving power which is employed to secure this proposed legislation.

I repeat that this bill can not be defended in morals nor can it rest upon any legal foundation for support. I submit that it is an affront to the brave men who entered West Point and thereafter gave their lives to their country. It is iteration and reiteration for me to state that the Regular Army officers made great sacrifices when they took upon themselves military careers. Their act practically alienated them from home and friends and condemned them to hardships and vicissitudes and poverty. It is, in my opinion, unfair and an insult to men of the class just referred to to take these thousands of volunteer officers, who have devoted the past 50 years to their own pursuits and callings, many of whom have grown rich and enjoyed political distinctions and honors and now enjoy the fruits of their labors, and give them the same status as that occupied by those whose entire lives have been devoted to their country and whose declining years find them homeless in most instances and with only a small bounty from the Government to preserve them from want.

I referred to the power of an organization to secure legislation. It is a matter of public history that numerous organizations are formed in our country for the purpose of securing legislation. If it is within the propriety of parliamentary language, I would say that some organizations exist only for the purpose of burglarizing the Treasury of the United States. The Government is deemed to be legitimate prey, and wild and fantastic schemes and propositions of questionable character find advocates who press with assiduity and unflagging zeal demands for Federal appropriations. In my opinion there are grave dangers to be apprehended from the persistent activities of powerful organizations which seek either municipal or State or Federal legislation. We know that corporations as well as individuals, by persistent lobbying, have secured franchises and improper concessions and grants from municipalities; and we read of State enactments which have been injurious to the general public, but highly advantageous to special interests or to a favored few, whose efforts were strongly put forth to secure the passage of the same. The history of national legislation will confirm the statement that sinister influences have at various times operated to secure the passage of laws not for the public welfare, but for private advantage. A few years ago there was great indignation because of the supposed activities of lobbyists in behalf of various corporate interests. A demand was made that the lobbyists be driven from the Capitol. No fair-minded person would deny either corporations or individuals the right to be heard when legislation is proposed that will affect them or their interests. Congress is not omniscient, and facts should be welcomed by legislators that will enable them to act in matters of legislation with an understanding of the questions involved and in a rational and just way. But I have sometimes felt that some organizations existed not to present facts to public officials who were called upon to act upon important matters, but to suppress or distort the facts and to set in motion powerful influences calculated to break down all opposition to the plans and purposes of such organizations. Senators have perceived the evil effects of organizations of this character, and of the intolerant and dishonest attitude often assumed by them. Frequently forces are unloosed in the districts and States, from which Representatives and Senators come, for the purpose of developing local sentiment which is to be exercised in favor of desired congressional legislation. We often hear it stated that a "back-fire" has been started against some Senator or Congressman. This method is frequently employed to compel legislators to support or oppose pending measures.

These methods are shameful and are discreditable to a great democracy. There have been powerful organizations effected to manufacture public sentiment and to misrepresent true public sentiment for the purpose of securing congressional action that would have been violative of international law. Organizations of this character sought to compel Congress to enact laws preventing the exportation of munitions to belligerents and to assume an unneutral attitude toward our present allies. There have been organizations that sought to bring this Republic into conflict with the Republic of Mexico. Public officials encounter conflicting forces and currents on every hand, and powerful influences are often exerted to prevent a fair and just consideration of public questions and action for the public welfare.

Without intending to refer the organizations in favor of woman suffrage or the temperance organizations to any class, I have sometimes felt that they as well as other organizations have been too intolerant and have conducted their activities in such a way as to call for a sharp rebuke. The senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] stated a few days ago that he was anxious for a vote on the proposed amendment to the Constitution in regard to woman suffrage. He gave his reason for this anxiety that he was "so pestered" by the lobbyists that he was unable to perform his work, and he desired a "little rest before he was called to another sphere of action." It seems that some of the charming ladies think the world will perish and the star of civilization will grow dim if the Constitution of the United States is not amended. Apparently they forget that the States are sovereign and each State can grant the franchise to women whenever it desires.

This bill presents another aspect which is of serious import. Precedents are guides to human conduct. It is wise and proper that they should be of importance in determining not only individual but governmental action. The decisions of the courts become the precedents for the future, and personal and property rights find protection in precedents. The present war may take from the peaceful pursuits of life millions of our bravest young men. There will probably be several hundred thousand of them commissioned in the Army and the Navy. Many of these officers will be volunteers and many will be found in the ranks of the National Army. It is not their purpose to give their entire lives to military and naval service; they expect, as we all do, that the war will terminate within a comparatively short period. The war may continue one year; it may last several years; but we know that Prussian militarism will be beaten to the earth, and that the sacred cause of liberty, for which we and our brave allies are fighting, will triumph, and that a just and lasting peace will come. These brave officers, who have gone from civil life into the great army of liberty, will greet with inexpressible joy the day when they can lay down their arms and return to home, to loved ones, and to the peaceful pursuits formerly followed by them. They do not expect, nor do they desire, military careers. They want to return to fields and farms and shops and former labors and professions, and with energy and zeal do their part to build up this Republic and to achieve for themselves success in the chosen vocations and professions to which their lives will be devoted.

There will be some, however, and particularly those who were educated in the military and naval academies, who will expect to devote their lives to military service under their country's flag. If the volunteer officers of the Civil War at the termination of the war separated themselves from the Army and returned to their homes and private pursuits, and for 50 years followed their chosen callings, are now entitled to be placed upon the retired list with the military rank which they held in the Army and are entitled to all of the emoluments and gratuities that are provided for the Regular Army officers, then under such precedent the hundreds of thousands of officers who will serve in this greatest of all wars, officers who volunteered or were drafted, will be entitled to like consideration and can, with as much propriety, demand that they be given a similar status. The young men who are now being given commissions in the Army and in the Navy do not have any expectation of being treated as Regular Army and naval officers when the war is over. They expect, as stated, to return to civil life. They do not desire to remain in the Army. They do not desire, and certainly can not expect, after many years shall elapse that they will be restored to an "officers' roll" and obtain "retired pay" and emoluments and the same official grade as those officers who, when the war is over, continue for many years in the military and naval service of their country, devoting their lives and energies to the military duties placed upon them. The passage of this bill will constitute a precedent which in the years to come will arise to plague the Republic. No doubt, if this bill shall pass, there will be selfish and unpatriotic men in after years who will insist that they be accorded the same treatment as this bill proposes to accord to the volunteer officers who served in the Civil War.

But, Mr. President, I have been told that nothing can prevent the passage of this bill to-day, that the die is cast, and that its success is certain. If this be true, then I suppose it would be the gracious thing for me to extend congratulations to the distinguished Senator from Michigan, who has been the particular champion of this bill for so long a time. It may be expected that I should say to him, in the language of the Scriptures, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." The balance of the Scripture I can not bring myself to quote.

Mr. President, I fear that appeals for economy will prove unavailing. They become tiresome, and the Senator who too often raises his voice against what he conceives to be extravagance and unwise appropriations will be regarded as unprogressive and antiquated. However, I appeal to Senators to pause and act with caution and circumspection when legislation is proposed that calls for Federal appropriations. I am willing to be generous—indeed, more than generous, in appropriating for the war. There is nothing which should be denied that will contribute to the winning of the war. There is only one goal now to be reached, and that is a complete and decisive military victory over our implacable foe. No matter what the cost—no matter it billions shall be piled upon billions—whatever is needed for the success of this great enterprise, it will be gladly given. As Cato concluded each address with the words, "Delenda es' Carthago," I know that all patriotic Americans daily demand that "Prussian militarism shall be destroyed."

We need billions for those whom we are sending across the seas. They are fighting for us, for our Nation, and for humanity. That is one reason why we should act with prudence in legislative matters. We should be economical to the point of parsimony in all things except in the appropriations for the Army and for the Navy. Every dollar that can be advantageously used in appropriations for the war should be appropriated without hesitation, and because such stupendous sums are required for the war it is imperative that the strictest economy should be practiced in all other branches of the Government. Not one dollar should be appropriated for any purpose that is not imperatively required. There are many matters that can wait. Our energies should be concentrated upon the one question, the overshadowing, the omnipotent question—the little petty matters and even larger things, they can wait. The war is devouring hundreds of industries and destroying the business enterprises of many of our population. There can not be "business as usual." The nonessential must give way to the things that are absolutely indispensable. There must be in our private lives, in our business pursuits, economy. Every avenue must point toward the great highway of war, and every stream throughout the broad land must pour its contents into the great river of war. And so the resources of the Nation must be devoted to the winning of the war. Our appropriations must have in view the winning of the war. Every appropriation must be justified because it contributes to the success of our military undertaking.

Col. Harvey, in his vigorous and highly useful "War Weekly," sums up the situation in his trenchant style by saying: "Billions for war only." I can not refrain from quoting from the article just mentioned, although I may not assent to all his statements and conclusions:

> Staggering as are the figures here given—the expenditures of the Government for the year just closing amount to approximately $13,000,000,000—no loyal American will begrudge the outlay. No consideration of expense must be allowed to interfere with the winning of the war, and no patriotic citizen will criticize the administration because of the vastness of its expenditures or complain of the burden which increased income and excess-profits taxes impose—provided the money is wisely expended.
> But with expenditures mounting at such a pace, with every citizen from the highest to the lowest compelled to contribute till it hurts, there comes imperative necessity for prudence, for economy, for wisdom. This is no time for cheeseparing, it is true. But also it is no time for reckless extravagance. "Millions for war but not one cent for politics" must be the watchword of all who control the expenditure of the public funds. Woe unto the administration which is convicted of wasting the substance of the American people, at this of all times, to promote the political welfare of any party or any candidate, avowed or merely prospective! The American people are a just and generous people. They are brave and they are patriotic. They are even forgiving. In large measure they have forgiven—at least for the time being—that unwillingness to prepare which now compels them to pay twice and thrice the cost which would have been incurred had military preparation been undertaken in due season. But a stern accounting awaits their public servants if they shall be found to have wasted the Nation's substance in pandering to certain elements of the voting population. And those whose ambitions prompt them to commit extravagances in order to promote their personal political welfare should take heed lest the nomination when procured prove worthless because they have incurred the wrath of those whom they have betrayed.
> Avoidable extravagance at this critical period of the war is simple treason. It is a betrayal, not alone of those who are straining every nerve to pay taxes and buy bonds, but of those who have gone "over there" cheerfully to give their lives, if need be, to save their country and the world from Prussianism. It is especially their betrayal, because every dollar wasted will mean subtraction from the material assistance which their Government can render them.

I have sometimes thought that sufficient attention was not given to the question of taxation and the fiscal measures required to meet the expenses of our Government. Stupendous appropriations are required, and we pass measures carrying billions of dollars with but little consideration. It is so easy to spend money, to pass appropriation bills, but always there must appear before the thinking man the specter which can not be driven away, which haunts him by day and by night, "How shall the appropriations, often so lavishly made, be met?" A few Senators only have positions upon the committee that considers ways and means and the great questions of finance involved in governmental operations. Most Senators are upon committees which report bills calling for expenditures. So the training of most legislators is along the line of spending money, not in the school that teaches how money shall be provided. We appropriated billions of dollars for the fiscal year 1918. We taxed the people so heavily that some financiers affected to believe that the financial fabric of the people would be strained. We were compelled to borrow billions in addition to that which was derived from taxation; and the States and counties and municipalities and school districts laid their heavy hand upon the people and took from them hundreds of millions of dollars. Our industrial condition was not only disturbed but in many instances suffered serious dislocations.

As I stated a moment ago, industries were destroyed, business houses were closed down, and many of the channels of trade and commerce were changed and greatly modified. All must admit that some fountains of national wealth have been dried up and the productivity of the people in many of the activities of life has been impaired, if not destroyed. Millions of men have been taken from pursuits and industries and business concerns of our country, and in many instances it has been impossible to fill their places. This has resulted inevitably in losses more or less serious to the Nation. Of course there have been compensations in the increased business in war activities, but the aggregate earnings of all the people will be less than what they were prior to the war. With a diminution in the earnings of the people and with a greatly increased demand for money for war purposes it is certain that the burdens of taxation will become increasingly heavy, and the necessity for additional loans from the people will be greater. I call attention to these facts, patent to every one, merely for the purpose of basing thereon a plea for economy upon the part of Congress. A distinguished Senator said to me that it is easier to get appropriation bills through Congress than to secure the passage of any other form of legislation. A friend of mine recently stated that he believed that if a corporation were organized to secure an appropriation to build an aerial tramway to the moon an appropriation could be obtained.

Mr. President, it is so easy, as I have stated, to be liberal with money that is not our own and to open the vaults of the Treasury in order that the golden flood may flow out. An able official of the Government stated in my presence this morning that it was a wholesome thing for governments to spend money; that the appropriations made went back to the people, and to that extent put money in circulation and gave an impetus to business. Of course, such a position is not only fallacious but so unsound and preposterous as to merit the strongest condemnation. The Government can raise money only by taxation and by the extension of credits. Taxation may be so burdensome as to be destructive of industry. The power to tax is the power to destroy, and the nation that proceeds upon the theory that it can be profligate in expenditures because it can exercise the sovereign power of taxation without limit, and the borrowing power which is a prerogative of a sovereign nation, will end in financial ruin, which may be followed by political revolution and national destruction. Wisdom demands, both in war times as well as in days of peace, that a sound fiscal system should be adopted, and that fundamental and rational principles of finance should be adhered to. With the expenses of the Government daily increasing, and with the sources of revenue diminishing, it becomes an imperative duty that the strictest economy shall be observed in the administration of the affairs of the Nation.

I have had occasion heretofore to remark that when the war spirit pervades the land the former standards of conduct seem to be abandoned, if not forgotten. The enormous expenditures of the Government fascinate the people, and the days of peace and the expenditures of peace times seem so unimportant and so mean and petty that a spirit almost akin to contempt arises and we feel that we have outgrown such provincial conditions. Everything is exaggerated and swollen. We have a biased view and our judgment is unbalanced. We justify enormous appropriations because we are at war, and, automatically, we apply the same standard to individual conduct and to all relations and activities. Everything must be done in a big way—not always in a thorough way—at great expense and under the fever, excitement, and lash of expedition. Reasons can be urged for all sorts of expenditures and enormous increases justified in payment for everything undertaken. We become intoxicated at the dazzling spectacle presented of billions of dollars being expended within a comparatively short time, and under this spell the tendency is to pass bills without scrutiny, regardless of the demands which they make upon the Public Treasury.

I recall that a few months ago I had the honor to preside when an appropriation bill was presented for consideration in this body. My recollection is that the measure called for over $3,000,000,000. Without debate, discussion, or explanation, and within less than an hour, a bill carrying this vast amount received the approval of the Senate.

I read in the paper this morning a criticism offered yesterday in the House of Commons by a distinguished statesman of England. He alluded to this unrestrained spirit which takes possession of the people in times of war and the disposition to extravagance and folly in dealing with public funds. He adjured the Parliament and the Government to watch every appropriation measure and to practice the utmost economy in expending all sums appropriated by the Parliament.

Mr. President, we appropriated at the last session of Congress, approximately, $18,000,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. More than that.

Mr. KING. My colleague states more than $18,000,000,000. The amounts carried by the various appropriation bills were so staggering that the human mind can scarcely comprehend them. For the coming fiscal year the demands that will be made upon the Treasury will be greatly increased. The appropriate committee is now considering the military appropriation bill and will report within a few hours a measure calling for approximately $11,000,000,000. What amount we will be called upon to provide to meet the expenses of the Government for the fiscal year of 1919 it is impossible now to even conjecture. And yet in the face of conditions of this character we manifest indifference when bills are presented calling for millions not required for the war and in many instances wholly unnecessary and wholly unjustified.

Disclaiming any desire to be critical, it does seem to me, Mr. President, that instead of trying to stop the stream and to prevent the dam from breaking we are, unwittingly of course, encouraging its destruction. I submit that it subjects us to the charge of being callous and indifferent to the country's welfare, if not unpatriotic, to support measures requiring appropriations that are not absolutely needed at this time. There are many matters that require attention, many enterprises that call for governmental aid, but most of them can wait until the world's greatest conflict has been concluded. Before this war is over the resources of this great Nation may be taxed to the utmost, and the burdens placed upon the people be so heavy as to be oppressive. Not only patriotism but wisdom requires that so far as it is possible to provide for the future it should be done. It would be criminal folly and almost traitorous negligence to omit preparations and provisions for the morrow. We should not proceed upon the theory that the war will end this year and that our credit will be inexhaustible, and that we can raise by taxation unlimited amounts. Rather, we should proceed upon the theory that the war will last for an indefinite period, that we will be required to furnish many millions of men, and that the cost to our Nation will be fifty or seventy-five billions of dollars.

We know that the American people will never make peace with Germany until Germany's military power is destroyed and the righteous and just demands of this Nation and our allies have been satisfied. There can not be any peace so long as Germany is a military force and power. It were better for this war to continue for decades and for the people of this Republic to endure privations and sacrifices, the extent of which we can not comprehend, than to have an indecisive ending of this conflict. We are fighting not only for the life of this Nation, but for the salvation of other nations, and that civilization may not be destroyed.

The peace of the world and the safety of nations can not longer be jeopardized by a soulless and devastating nation.

Germany is the mad dog of the world. She must be muzzled until the poison is eradicated from her system.

We are fighting for that happy day when the earth shall not be an armed camp, and when justice shall obtain between nations, and fraternity and fellowship bind the nations into a league or confederation governed by enduring principles of justice and righteousness.

Mr. President, day before yesterday a number of measures were passed by this body calling for increased appropriations. One claimed to be a pension bill growing out of the Spanish-American War. Young men who were unmarried volunteered for service when the War with Spain came to our land. Many of them served but a few days and spent their time in their own States or in camps within the United States. I know of some who went to California and had a delightful time in the forests of that great State. This bill gave large pensions to their widows and children, notwithstanding the fact that they were not married when they entered the service, nor did they receive any wounds or take part in any battles. The theory seems to be that if one volunteers for a few months' service in the Army he and his family shall be entitled to pensions at the hands of the Government.

The Senator from Kansas, who had charge of the bill, in urging its passage, said it only called for a few million dollars a year. As I remember, it was only ten or twelve million dollars per annum, and, of course, the plea for the measure rested upon the ground that the Government should be generous in dealing with those who had rendered military service. Of course, such a plea cheapens patriotism and breeds a spirit of dependency utterly at variance with the spirit which should animate those who live in a free Republic.

I can not understand the position which seems to be approved by most legislators that it is the duty of the Government to pay gratuities and pensions to men who volunteered for military service and spent but a few days or a few weeks not in actual conflict, but in some pleasant camp, and returned home in perfect health and strength, without wounds or without any physical disabilities resulting from their service. Yesterday we appropriated $220,000,000 in the general pension bill. Next year it may be half a billion dollars.

Senators will recall that a few years ago, when the great Senator from Iowa, now deceased, Senator Allison, and Senators Hale, Frye, and Hoar, and Morgan, and Cockrell, and Vest, and Daniel sat in this Chamber, expenditures were scrutinized and appropriation bills were subjected to rigid examination. The appropriation bills of that period were comparatively insignificant, measured by the vast amounts carried by the appropriation bills of this Congress, and yet those distinguished men examined with care and patriotic zeal the items carried in the bills under consideration. In my opinion the existence of war should increase rather than diminish the determination of public officials to enact wise and prudent legislation; it should compel greater consideration of measures carrying appropriations. In times of war chains are often forged to bind the people, and policies are adopted and steps taken which result in future burdens for the people. With the historical evidences before us proving that waste and extravagance are concomitants of war and that financial burdens are created by war, there should arise within the hearts of all who have to deal with public questions a determination that only such legislation shall be enacted as is absolutely necessary and is rational and just.

There is a sacred trust resting upon Senators and it should be discharged with an eye single to the welfare of the Republic. Senators upon the other side of the Chamber have upon a number of occasions criticized the party in power for its extravagance since the war began. My distinguished colleague [Mr. SMOOT] in a recent speech stated, in effect, that the Democratic Party was guilty of "criminal extravagance." The proponent of this bill is one of the leaders of the Republican Party. He doubtless expects the support of Senators who are of his political faith. Doubtless many will support this bill, and perhaps some of them will go before the people and charge the party in power with extravagance and a criminal waste of public funds. I would like to state, by way of parenthesis, that I have discovered no great desire for economy upon the part of Republican Senators. They are usually found supporting appropriations of the character which I have been condemning. They criticize, claim incompentency and extravagance, but are the chief offenders in supporting legislation which gives color or foundation for the criticism.

The Democratic Party may expect that our Republican friends will challenge the ability of the Democratic Party to conduct the affairs of the Nation and bitter criticism will be leveled against the party in power because of its alleged incompetency and it will be charged with the profligate waste of money, and yet if the record is examined it will be found that Republican Senators have supported with almost perfect unanimity and with uninterrupted constancy appropriations and measures which come within the category to which the pending measure must be assigned.

However, if there shall be extravagance in the conduct of the affairs of the Government or appropriations unnecessary and unwarranted, the Democratic Party will not be excused by the great electorate of the Nation because the Republicans have more constantly and with greater unanimity supported such legislation. It will not be sufficient for the Democrats to secure immunity and to exculpate themselves from charges of incompetency and of extravagance by replying that the Republicans supported the measures which may apparently give color to the charge. The party in power will be held responsible for mistakes, if any are made, in the conduct of the affairs of the Government. While this is a republic, it is a government through parties. The control of a government by parties has its disadvantages, but the benefits and advantages are superior to those appearing in nations that are controlled by groups. The Democratic Party controls the House and the Senate; the Executive is a Democrat, chosen by a great and a historic party. The Democratic Party is in control of the Government; and while it is true there is a manifest disposition upon the part of all loyal Americans to subordinate partisanship, and while the Republicans have exhibited a commendable spirit of patriotism and a sincere desire to uphold the hands of the President in the prosecution of the war, nevertheless if there shall be any failure in any branch of the Government, if any mistakes shall be made, whether in domestic or in foreign policies, whether relating to internal affairs or whether connected with the prosecution of the war, the Democratic Party will be compelled to bear the burden and odium of such mistake or failure, and it will be judged indepedently of the fact that Republicans were responsible in part for the act or omission constituting the basis of criticism or complaint.

Mr. President, the psychology of war, though it has received attention, is still somewhat of a phenomenon. It produces a mental condition that is almost inexplicable. It affects the social relations of the people and disturbs their entire current of thought and action. It arouses the cupidity of many people, and while it stimulates patriotism and develops a strong national spirit and brings out some of the finer and nobler qualities of the people, it also uncovers some of their baser and, indeed, ignoble characteristics. Many are obscessed with the desire for gain and profit and the acquisition of wealth. The speculative spirit is strongly developed and frenzied and extravagant views take possession of many whose past lives and conduct show a prudence and sobriety utterly at variance with the perceived change, and the spirit that prompts a disregard of details and sober, conservative conduct and leads to wild and extravagant expenditures manifests itself most strongly in bodies or in groups of large proportions. It is a matter of historical knowledge that individuals acting in mass will do things which they would regard as immoral and unjust if they were to act individually in respect to them. Judge Dillon calls attention to this sociological phenomenon in his reference to the conduct of municipal councils. He shows that many corrupt franchises have been granted and many acts done by municipal governing bodies composed of honorable and upright men that, if the responsibility had rested upon the individual members of the municipal councils to act upon the measures, the result would have been entirely different.

And the conclusion is drawn that the conscience of the individual is more acute than the mass conscience; that a group of individuals will more readily support an unjust and improper measure than the indivdual members of the group if the responsibility rested upon each one individually. Perhaps, Mr. President, the psychology of war finds expression in this great body. It may be possible that we are not immune from its dangerous manifestations. It is possible that this pathological condition accounts for the expression so often heard here and elsewhere, "We are at war and we must expect extravagance and waste, and that serious, if not fatal, blunders will be made."

No one could reasonably expect a great peace-loving people to convert a democratic nation into a military power without serious mistakes. It is impossible to change the entire current of our lives and the great streams of business and commerce and direct all things into the channel of war without industrial disturbances, profound social convulsions, and political and governmental difficulties. Of course there will be mistakes and waste, but because we appreciate that such will result does not warrant those charged with responsibilities in closing their eyes or in encouraging extravagance or defending improper legislation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, for some 14 years I have been trying to protect the Treasury of the United States from raids made upon it, and I have become almost discouraged; but what I wanted to call my colleague's attention to is the fact that all of the increases in pensions that have been agreed to at this session of Congress do not amount to one-sixth of 1 per cent of the appropriations which were made last year. In other words, even if this bill is passed, and the appropriations amount to only $24,000,000,000—which some think is lower than the total will be for the coming fiscal year—the amount involved in the increase of pensions will be about one-eighth of 1 per cent; and what I should like my colleague to do, and what I believe he will do in the future, will be to try, in connection with some of us, to eliminate extravagant appropriations from the other 99⅞ per cent. In the latter is where the extravagant appropriations are made and wicked waste is made possible.

Perhaps my colleague and I do not agree upon the question of pensions. I think that the passage of my pension bill, increasing the pensions of the Civil War veterans $35,000,000, was nothing more than justice to the men who served their country as the veterans did. I believe it with all my heart. If I were the Government of the United States, and those men had served me as they served the Government of the United States, I want to say to the Senate now that I would take care of them just the same as the Government is doing to-day, and a little better. Therefore I do not consider the appropriation for the Civil War veterans an unwise expenditure upon the part of the Government, because I believe the Senator himself, if those men had rendered that service to him, would take as good care of them as the Government has, from the day the service was rendered down to the present time—of course, if he were in the same position as the Government, and owned the same amount of property, and had the same powers and resources.

I fully agree with most of the statements made by my colleague with relation to the extravagant appropriations that are being made, and I say to him that the day will come when an accounting will be demanded; and when that day comes I want to be one to say to the American people that I tried my best to prevent unjust appropriations. But there is too much in what the Senator says, that whenever it comes to taking money out of the Treasury of the United States you will find very few opposing it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, though I am a Democrat and have supported the Democratic Party ever since I have taken part in political life, I believe that in hours of great national peril there should be a subsidence of the partisan spirit. There should be no partisanship in the prosecution of the war. There is no party principle involved in the appropriations which we are called upon to make, and there is little if any legislation now required which could properly call for a partisan vote, and certainly upon the question of conserving the resources of our Nation in order to successfully prosecute the war and upon all questions involving economy and wise and prudent expenditures of the public moneys no partisan question ought to arise. While I may be regarded as partisan, I have always had pleasure in commending the patriotic service of great Republican leaders and calling attention to the contributions which they have made in behalf of our country.

I appreciate any efforts that may have been put forth by my distinguished colleague and Republican Senators to curb appropriations.

Replying to the suggestion of my colleague concerning the pensioning of the old soldiers, I do not know that I seriously disagree with his position. I have felt that there were some receiving pensions who did not deserve them. I believe that a grateful people should generously treat the brave men who risked so much to defend the flag and to preserve this Nation. Those who were wounded or incurred disabilities should be treated most generously. There should be a proper distinction between men in that situation and those who served but for a few days and incurred no risks or dangers and sustained no physical injuries. I would be more than generous to the families of those who died upon the battle fields or from wounds and disabilities incurred in the line of service. Those who did serve their country, those whose service contributed to the preservation of the Union, I would treat not only justly and fairly but generously. But, Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the subject of pensions. I alluded to the matter merely by way of illustration. In the generalizations submitted I have not had in mind any particular pension legislation. I have been attempting to emphasize the fact that the spirit of the hour seems to be inconsistent with calm and careful and prudent consideration of legislation, and particularly such measures as relate to Federal appropriations. The question of a few billions of dollars in an appropriation bill excites but little comment and receives but indifferent attention.

It has been said that we may be called upon to appropriate $24,000,000,000 for the fiscal year of 1919. I ask Senators, merely for the purpose of arresting attention and provoking a critical examination of all measures proposed calling for public funds, where are we to obtain this enormous sum? It is obvious that we will be unable to raise more than perhaps 30 per cent of this vast amount by taxation. It would be impossible to meet all of the expenses of the Government from current taxation. To secure $8,000,000,000 in one year under the taxing power will bear heavily upon the people. It must not be forgotten that the sources of taxation are decreasing and that the war is devouring or destroying some industries and enterprises which in the past have been prosperous. In addition to the national demands the people will be compelled to bear the burdens imposed by the States and municipalities. These burdens will be heavy; but that is not the end of the demands which the people will be compelled to meet. Twelve or fifteen millions or more must be supplied by the people. War-savings stamps and bonds must be purchased by the people in order that the Government may obtain the money required to meet its obligations.

There is a limit to taxation. A well-formulated rule has been suggested as follows: Taxation should be carried to the point where the remainder of the needed income of the Government can safely be provided out of the proceeds of loans; that is, be provided without producing inflation of credit and prices. It must be remembered that there are limits not only to taxation but to the sources from which the Government can obtain the means to prosecute the war. The only source to which the Government can go is current income; that must produce both the tax revenue and the revenue obtained from the sale of Government securities, and, indeed, the revenue from every other source.

Prof. W. I. King's estimate of the entire income of all the people of the United States in 1910 was approximately $30,000,000,000. Perhaps at the time our country entered the war, owing to the inflation of the currency and other causes, the income, that is, the earnings of all the people, was approximately forty to forty-five billions of dollars annually. Of course, this means the income expressed in terms of money. As I have stated, the Government can obtain funds only from the surplus or current funds; that is, the excess of the income of the people above their other expenditures.

It is manifest that with some sources of income being curtailed if not destroyed, the gross income of the people will probably be less during the current year than it was during 1916. It has been stated by economists that when our current income was from thirty-five to forty billions of dollars, there were only $5,000,000,000 available for investments. In other words, after the wants of the people had been satisfied out of this annual income there was left for investment or for savings, only $5,000,000,000. Of course the amount consumed by the people must be materially reduced or bankruptcy would come to the Nation. If the Government takes eight billions of taxation, then the people will be compelled to spend less and save more in order to meet the revenue demands of the Government.

Those who are called upon to appropriate billions to meet the expenditures of the Government must seriously consider the question of how the Government is to be financed. It would be not only imprudent but childish to make great appropriations without adopting adequate means to meet them. Senators must keep constantly before them the thought that this war may be of long duration, and that with diminishing resources the ability of the people to meet the increased demands will be correspondingly diminished, all of which presents a powerful argument for economy and earnest, serious consideration of every measure presented which seeks to take money from the Treasury of the Government.

I am calling attention to these matters not for the purpose of dampening the enthusiasm of anyone for the war, but only for the purpose of creating, if possible, a determination upon the part of the people to practice economy to the end that there may be more funds available to the Government and to induce, if possible, the highest economies in the administration of the affairs of the Government.

A gentleman stated to me yesterday that Congress was spending money like a drunken sailor. His idea was that the spirit of extravagance was found everywhere, and that even the Senate was not immune from its poisonous effects.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to my friend from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I quite agree with the Senator that a drunken sailor spending money is a very sober individual compared with Congress.

I note that the Democratic platform in Indiana yesterday declared in favor of a budget system, as the Democratic national platform two years ago declared in favor of it, and likewise the Republican platform. Does not the Senator think that Congress will have to answer to the American people for not establishing some budget system or some sensible system of finance in running this Government? Are these platform promises all camouflage, as such promises generally are? Does not the Senator believe that we must change in some way our system of doing business? Here are a number of committees all appropriating, with no coordination between them, each one apparently spending all the money it can get hold of. How long could any private business last under such a system?

Mr. KING. I know that the Senator has been advocating for years the budget system. Why, it is so stupid as to be criminal for a great nation such as this to continue without a budget system. It seems incredible that a nation which is spending billions should make no provision for the ascertainment of its expenditures, and the determination of its resources. Thousands of claims are made, numerous committees are recommending appropriations, hundreds of bills are passed carrying large appropriations, and yet there is no central body or committee or authority to coordinate, if I may use the term, the appropriations and the resources and revenues. Of course, we violate every business rule and throw common sense to the wind in following the methods which control our dealings with fiscal matters and governmental expenditures.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I do not believe the Senator, with all his splendid ability, can get a single committee in the Senate to consider the budget plan, or even to appoint a commission to give information to committees that know nothing about the budget plan. That has been my experience; and I hope we will quit in our political platforms advocating budget systems, as both parties are doing, and then never doing anything about it. Let us at least be candid.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I presume the Senator from Iowa means to say that he wishes political parties would quit lying?

Mr. KENYON. I wish they would; but I do not think they will.

Mr. VARDAMAN. They are not going to; but the Senator wishes they would quit making promises that they never intend to fulfill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] must not be impatient nor indulge in gloomy forebodings. We have made great progress. Humanity has been "marching on." The moral growth of a people is slow, and the centuries alone can bear attestation to the fact that mankind is governed by a moral law which produces slow and painful and tragic advancement. But there has been advancement, great advancement, and liberty and truth have come into the world, and God's presence is felt the world over.

Mr. President, there are many disheartening things in public life. Reforms are not effectuated in a day or in a generation. All progress is the result of evolutionary development. Political systems are growths and these governmental improvements will only come as the result of agitation and intelligent and rational discussion. There is social evolution as there is biological development, and humanity moves slowly out of darkness and twilight into a brighter and broader day. But the difficulties encountered are merely stepping-stones to higher things. Without desiring to moralize as the suggestions of the Senator from Iowa might incline one to do, it is sufficient to say that our Nation is the product of struggle and political development. Opposition, defeats, and obstacles result in strength and courage, and lead the people to stronger endeavor and higher resolves and ultimately to greater achievements. The Senator from Iowa ought not to be discouraged. If his plan is treated apathetically, or if it is violently opposed, his enthusiasm should increase and his persistence become more dogged. I commend to him the examples of those who have carried the banners of reform in all ages of the world. The masses of the people have looked with wondering eyes and oftentimes with contempt and hatred at the struggling forms of those heroic characters who have ascended the rugged heights of greatness and success.

The budget system will come; we will change this stupid, blundering way which we now follow in our legislative methods.

Mr. President, who ultimately must meet the burdens imposed by taxation? It is labor. Who is it that produces wealth? It is not the banker; it is not the capitalist; it is the man who works and toils in the mine, in the shop, and on the farm. This great building, beautiful in its architectural proportions, would not have been here except for labor. All the gold and silver in the world could not build this splendid structure. God himself is a builder; labor is worship, as Carlyle tells us; and upon the shoulders of labor the future of humanity rests. The man who toils and builds and produces—he is the true follower and faithful servant of the Master Workman.

We want to remember the men who toil, the men who have to bear the burdens of the future—the farmers, the laboring men, who out of nature's great bosom must wring those things indispensable to life and absolutely essential to our prosperity. They will bear the burdens of the future, not the bankers, not the business men; and every dollar that we expend now we have got to take some day out of the bent form of the laboring man. Yet we spend money as though it were inexhaustible.

Mr. President, I have said all that I intend to say against this bill. I again characterize it as an unjust and indefensible measure. It ought to be defeated. Let us do our duty and defeat it now. I feel convinced that if such a fate overtakes it, my distinguished friend from Michigan, because of his innate sense of justice, deep down in his heart will say, "Amen."

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I admire very much the optimism of my distinguished friend from Utah [Mr. KING]. I am reminded that the dream of the philosopher to-day is often the creed of the persecuted minority to-morrow, the day following to become the faith of a nation. I join with him also in the sincere hope that—

> Out of the twilight of the past
> We move to a diviner light;
> For nothing that is wrong can last,
> Nothing's immortal but the right.

I confess, however, that the buoyant, hopeful spirit which usually pulsates in my bosom has had its action somewhat retarded recently by the unfolding of events; but I did not rise to discuss matters generally. I notice, as I look over the Democratic side of the Chamber, that there is but one Senator on that side, and he is a good, faithful, honest, hard-working Republican. [Laughter.] On the Republican side there are four equally industrious, patient, long-suffering statesmen. That is the usual condition we find in this Chamber when unanimous consent to vote on a bill has been given.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. VARDAMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that there are six Senators over here, and that I think he overlooked the occupant of the chair.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Oh, of course, the occupant of the chair can not get out. [Laughter.] He does not deserve any credit for being present. He is here under compulsion.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Mississippi having stated that there are no Senators present on the Democratic side, and one Republican sitting there, and only six on the Republican side, I ask if that is not in fact the suggestion of the absence of a quorum?

Mr. VARDAMAN. No; it is not. There is a quorum here, for all practical purposes.

Mr. KENYON. I ask the question seriously.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But, as I was about to say, that is usually the condition which we find in this Chamber after the Senate has consented to vote upon a measure, however important it may be.

Mr. President, it is with great reluctance that I oppose any measure which is ardently and earnestly favored by my friend, the able, genial, and always courteous Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I know that my friend, the able Senator, is honest, patriotic, and faithful to all the duties and obligations of life as God gives him the power to see the right. He believes that the officers on the Federal side of the War between the States have earned the peculiar distinction which this bill confers, and that the enactment of this law is but simple justice, long deferred.

I am willing to concede, Mr. President, that the Government of the United States is under obligations to those veterans, and that it is the duty of this Government to see that the shadows of the evening of life are not darkened by the adumbrations of poverty or the apprehensions of want; and in recognition of their services to the Government, I shall gladly vote to give them a pension which will insure all the comforts of a modest, proper life. I wish it understood that I yield to no Member of this body in my respect and admiration for the brave man who did his duty, as God gave him the power to see his duty, on the Federal side of that unfortunate war which submerged our fair land in fraternal blood during the years of 1861 to 1865.

My honored father gave four of the best years of his good life to the service of the Stars and Bars on the other side of the question, and I know with what respect and high regard he held the brave men who wore the blue, "when the war drum throbbed no longer, and the battle flags were furled." They were foemen worthy of his steel, and he respected them for their bravery and heroism. There was no lingering hate in his heart. There were none of the slumbering fires of the feud in the hearts of the brave men who fought the battles of that war on either side. After the Stars and Bars trailed in the dust of defeat on that fateful day at Appomattox, and the court of might handed down its decision on the question of the right of secession, the southern soldiers accepted the arbitrament of that court as irrevocable, and from that day to this they and their sons have been ready to die in defense of the Stars and Stripes.

When I hear questions growing out of that war discussed in this Chamber in a partisan spirit at this late day, it universally affects me as a kind of mental emetic, and an almost uncontrollable impulse seizes my soul to vacate the Chamber. Whatever may have been the differences of opinion regarding the cause that brought on the War between the States and the rights involved in that titanic struggle, they have all been settled years ago, permanently and eternally. The Union is complete, and the issues growing out of that war and the questions confronting us to-day will require perfect unity of heart, of mind, of soul and body, and the cooperation of the intellect of all the people, in all the walks of life, to save America, if indeed the Republic shall be saved from the disintegrating influences which have wrought the downfall of the republics of the past, whose skeletons are scattered on the shores of time to-day.

Hate hurts the heart that harbors it. It beclouds the intellect, poisons the springs of human love, and obscures the vision which is necessary to lead us safely across the turbulent sea to the port of permanent peace and everlasting prosperity.

I do not oppose this bill because the beneficiaries of the legislation were on the northern side of the conflict 50 years ago. I would dishonor the place I hold in this Chamber if such a thought or impulse as that ever entered my mind. But, Mr. President, I think that in the realm of patriotism there is no caste, no aristocracy of rank, no privilege of emoluments. Nor do I think that in this Republic anything should be done to make professional military service popular with the citizenry of this country. It is the duty of every citizen to give his all in defense of the Nation in time of war, and that duty is equally binding upon the citizen in time of peace.

If this bill shall be passed, it will be followed in quick succession by a bill putting upon the retired list officers who served in the Spanish-American War, and then will follow in turn legislation putting upon the retired list the officers who are rendering such heroic service to the country in the trenches of France, thus imposing upon labor a burden which labor will not be able to bear. This Government has no right to take the products of human toil, the toil of its citizens, and give it to another citizen, whatever service that citizen may have rendered the Government, unless that citizen needs the pension to provide the comforts of life. The pension roll should be a roll of honor. The Government should bestow the pension in the spirit that it would absolve any other moral obligation. No true patriot ever speculates in his patriotism, and no patriotic service is ever rendered to the Government with a hope of pecuniary reward. While the officer's salary is greater than that of the private soldier, the responsibility is also greater; and in so far as dollars and cents can compensate an officer for this greater responsibility in time of war the Government does so.

But the service which the officer renders to the Government is of no more importance, involving no greater personal sacrifice, and the motive is no higher and purer than that which prompts the private soldier. It may be proper to give greater compensation to the officer during the war; but after the war is over, when the Government comes to pay the tribute of its gratitude to the soldier for the service rendered in time of war, the officer and the private should be on a dead level of equality. There should be no favorites when the services are equally meritorious.

I was an officer, if I may be permitted a personal reference, in the war between this country and Spain, 20 years ago. I know I suffered no greater hardships; I am sure that I did not offer to make the supreme sacrifice any more readily or more willingly than inspired the conduct of the private soldier. It will require quite as much for the private soldier to live in comfort in times of peace as will be necessary to support the officer. And I confess that I would suffer a humiliating sense of injustice, of indefensible selfishness, if I should demand more for myself from the Public Treasury than I am willing to accord to my brethren in the ranks.

I repeat, Mr. President, in the realm of real patriotism there is no aristocracy of rank, and there should not be a difference in emoluments for the services rendered by the volunteer citizen soldiery of this Republic.

Pass this bill and you lay the foundation for a military aristocracy in this country. You will create a class that will live in idleness upon the products of somebody else's toil. They will become at once a most potential factor in politics, and all the influence that will emanate from that class of honorable citizens will be antagonistic to the true spirit of equality and democracy which should control the affairs of this country. It is a dangerous experiment and I fear will lead ultimately to military despotism in this Republic.

Mr. President, America is passing through a crucial test. Just whether we are going to be able to save the Republic in all of its pristine vigor and democratic efficiency is problematical. For myself, I confess that I am a little apprehensive for the future. The one ray of light, however, which breaks through the clouds overhanging the horizon of the Nation's future is the saving grace of the honesty, courage, and patriotism of the plain man and woman at home. Somebody has said: "The veil which covers the face of futurity is woven by the hand of mercy." That is true—wisely and providentially true.

It is the uncertainty of the future which makes it possible for us to endure the hardships of life to the end. But we can not be too careful and circumspect in this hour of desperate emergency. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. The influences set in motion to-day may mark the present as the turning point in the life of the Government. I have sometimes thought that it would be a wise provision if the organic law of this Nation contained a clause which would provide that the life of all laws enacted in time of war should be limited to the duration of the war.

The world is crazy, daft. A blood lust dims the intellectual eye, intoxicates the heart, and smothers out the fires of love in the human soul. Hate is the dominating passion of the hour and greed for gain multiplies our difficulties. Everything is being done to cause us to question the wisdom of tried policies and principles which have made America great. There are some statesmen in this country who seem to be inspired with a feeling of contempt for everything ancient, however meritorious it may have proven itself to be. It is time to stop, look, and listen. There are snares and pitfalls on the highway just ahead and in these trying days when we see a strange mingling of all the good, heroic, moral, and sublime with the bad, low, groveling qualities of the human soul, I repeat, we should hesitate and consider well before we take the important step. The men who were willing to give their lives in defense of their Nation's flag I am quite sure if they should think about just what this character of legislation will lead to inevitably, would not ask that the Republic make the sacrifice herein involved. We can not afford to destroy the Republic in order to pay a compliment to a few distinguished persons.

I have always been taught to regard the heroes of the War between the States as the character of man described by one of the ancient philosophers, who said:

> The greatest man is he who chooses right with the most invincible resolution; who resists the sorest temptation from within and without; who bears the heaviest burden cheerfully; who is calmest in storms and most fearless under many menaces and frowns; whose reliance on truth, on virtue, and on good is most unfaltering.

I hope that the conduct of my fellow countrymen may not cause me to change that exalted opinion, which found lodgment readily in my youthful, impressionable mind.

Mr. President, as stated in the outset, I regret that I can not support this measure. I should like to pay the tribute of my respect and admiration to these brave soldiers of the Civil War by extending to them any favor that they might ask, and I should like to vote for it for the further reason that my friend, the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], desires so earnestly the passage of this measure, but my sense of obligation to my country prevents me from voting for the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I trust the Senate is ready for a vote and I should not occupy any time at all were it not for two or three statements that were made during the latter part of the remarks of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Michigan to yield to me for a very brief statement.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I gladly yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when I came into the Chamber a moment ago the attention of the country was being called to the fact that there were very few Senators present. Had it not been that I was engaged in the Committee on Appropriations as a member of a subcommittee considering a very important bill there would have been one more Senator in the Chamber than there was, and as in a very few minutes I shall have to return to the committee room to continue the work, I shall take but a minute or two to make a statement concerning my attitude on the pending bill.

When this bill was laid before the Senate a year ago or thereabouts I gave it very careful examination, and I came to the conclusion then that it is a very proper recognition to be given to the few remaining soldiers of the Civil War. I have been told that they average 80 years of age, and in the very nature of things this recognition, whether it be a matter of obligation or gratuity on the part of the Government, will not continue for many years.

These men, Mr. President, rendered a very important service to the Government in "the days that tried men's souls," and for that reason they deserve our consideration in anything and everything that will tend to their comfort in their declining years.

If I felt that any harm would come to the Government because of this legislation, if I felt that it would impose upon the labor of the country, as suggested by my friend the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], a burden that they ought not to bear, I certainly would not support the bill.

But it is, after all, Mr. President, a trifle that the bill carries. We are considering now a bill in the Committee on Appropriations which carries about $3,000,000,000, and it is going to be very largely added to. In the Committee on Military Affairs they are considering a bill that carries $11,000,000,000, I understand. Under those circumstances the trifle that is carried in this bill is scarcely worthy of consideration.

Mr. President, for the reason I have already stated, that I examined this bill with great care and came to the conscientious conclusion that it deserved my support, and having reexamined it since it has been under consideration at this session, I wish to record my vote in favor of it when the vote shall be taken at the hour of 4 o'clock or at such earlier hour as may be determined upon. I believe it is good legislation. I believe it is legislation that is just and fair to the few remaining veterans of the Civil War who were officers in the Army, and I can not believe that it will do any real harm to any interests of the Government or any class of our citizens.

I thank the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, as I said when I yielded to the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire, I do not care to make any further remarks upon this bill further than to correct two or three statements which have been made by those in opposition to it.

In the first place, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] repeatedly stated yesterday that the act of August 3 was about a month after the acts of July 22 and 25. Of course if he had consulted the calendar, he would have discovered that it was only a few days—about a week—between the dates of enactments.

The fact of the matter is that the act of August 3 was pending before Congress when the acts of July 22 and 25 were under consideration, and the reference to retirement was under discussion and had been under discussion when the act of July 25 amended the act of July 22. So the statement should be that these volunteers "in all respects" were to be on an equality, including retirement, with the Regular Army soldiers.

Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] dwelt at some length, as have others, upon the fact that when the volunteer officers were mustered out at the close of the war they had all the opportunities of life before them and that the officer who had been in the service as a volunteer, but immediately entered the Regular Army, was confined in his opportunities to the vocation of a soldier. I will state what the fact of the matter is. I wish to make no invidious distinctions, because I have only the highest regard for the Regular Army officers; but when the volunteer officer was mustered out and into the Regular Army he had his whole future financial, business, and social life guaranteed to him. There was no need for him to worry thereafter. He and his family were provided for, whereas these boys went home after having spent five years in the service of their country, in many cases impaired in health, only to find many of the opportunities gone that existed for them before they enlisted. They did not have the opportunities that they theretofore had had; and the pathetic part of it is that while the volunteer officers who entered the Regular Army and for the remainder of their lives lived amidst the most agreeable surroundings, it is easy to imagine, with none of the cares and worries attendant upon the struggle for a livelihood or for a competence necessary to themselves and families, yet to-day a large percentage of the volunteer officers who were mustered out and entered the walks of peace are now in the soldiers' homes of the country. Their future was not guaranteed. They have not succeeded financially. They are known now as "old pensioners," with few so poor as to do them reverence.

Mr. President, we have not treated the Regular Army officers in "all respects" as we did the volunteers. Senators who have discussed this bill in opposition have left out the real point, namely, that as many as a dozen laws have been passed by Congress since the war closed giving additional benefits to Regular Army officers who were volunteer officers during a portion of the Civil War, and solely because of the fact that they were for a time Civil War volunteers.

Now that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has come into the Chamber, I repeat what I said when he was out—that he did not understand the act of August 3, 1861. He said it was passed a month after the other two acts. It was passed only a few days after the act of July 25, and during all that time the act of August 3 was before Congress, as the RECORD will show. The question of retirement was discussed while the act of July 25 was under consideration.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRAMMELL in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Would it not be true that there would be less reason to believe that they would have any benefit of retirement because they then knew that the act of August 3, 1861, would not apply to them after they had separated themselves from the service?

Mr. TOWNSEND. They knew nothing of the kind. The opposite inference was absolutely necessary under the act of August 3.

But, Mr. President, I do not care to discuss that point any further. I wish simply to correct the inference that was given out by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. In a low voice he stated that he thought the author of this bill would say "amen" if a majority of the Senate would vote it down. The Senator is mistaken. I know he is a courteous Senator and does not wish to cast any reflection upon my motives, but I trust my record on this floor has shown that I have never yet advocated any measure that I wanted defeated. I may have made mistakes, as other Sentors have, and undoubtedly I have made them, but I am conscientiously in favor of this bill. I believe it ought to have been enacted long ago. During the few years I have had charge of it I have frequently met with committees of volunteer officers who have had charge of the measure—some of the finest men I have ever known. I do not think to-day there is a single member of the original first two or three committees living. They are all gone. They died contending for what they believed to be but justice to themselves and their comrades. That picture is before me. I think I have devoted as much thought to this subject as has any other Senator here, and I repeat that I am conscientiously in favor of the passage of the bill.

I do not care to delay the Senate further from a vote if it is ready to proceed. I suggest the absence of a quorum, that all Senators who are in the city and who desire to do so may vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	Martin	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Hardwick	Nelson	Sterling
Calder	Hollis	Norris	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Thompson
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Page	Townsend
Culberson	Kellogg	Phelan	Trammell
Cummins	Kendrick	Poindexter	Underwood
Curtis	King	Ransdell	Vardaman
Dillingham	Kirby	Robinson	Warren
Fernald	Lenroot	Saulsbury	Watson
Gallinger	Lewis	Shafroth
Gronna	McLean	Sheppard
Hale	McNary	Shields

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] and the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] on official business, and to let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on official business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRAMMELL). My colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is absent on official business.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], detained on official business; also the absence of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], occasioned by personal illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators having answered to their names on the roll call, there is a quorum present. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and subject to amendment. If no amendment be proposed, it will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I do not know how he would vote on this question, and therefore I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], which I transfer to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily away for the day. I have a pair with him, so I shall have to withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a pair on this question with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence, and being unable to secure a transfer of the pair, I withhold my vote. If the Senator from Georgia were present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. MCCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. He being absent from the Chamber, and being unable to secure a transfer of the pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. He being absent, and not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. In his absence I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. NEW] and vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when the name of Mr. WEEKS was called). My colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. If he were present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who, I understand, has not voted. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] are detained on official business. I wish also to announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] is detained on official business, and, if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH];

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]; and

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is unavoidably absent on account of illness. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CALDER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], but on this question I am at liberty to vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. COLT. Has the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr SAULSBURY] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. COLT. I have a general pair with that Senator, and being unable to obtain a transfer I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS. Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. MCCUMBER. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—30.

Brandegee	Gallinger	Knox	Sterling
Calder	Gronna	Lewis	Thompson
Chamberlain	Hale	McCumber	Townsend
Cummins	Harding	McNary	Wadsworth

Henderon	McLean	Smith, Md.	Wolcott

So the bill was passed.

SALARIES OF STEAMBOAT INSPECTORS.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2194) to amend sections 4402, 4404, and 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask the Senator what is the purpose of the bill?

Mr. VARDAMAN. The purpose of the bill is to increase the salaries of steamboat-boiler inspectors. The bill had the unanimous approval of the Committee of Commerce of the Senate, and it has been so amended that the amounts have been fixed at the same sum at which they were fixed in the House bill, which passed and came over to the Senate some months ago.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is this bill identical with the House bill?

Mr. VARDAMAN. It is identical with the House bill, I think.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no objection to its consideration.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want to say, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi that the bill named by him be taken up for consideration?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask for the reading of the title of the bill, so that we may know what is proposed to be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the bill by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2104) to amend sections 4402, 4404, and 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask for the reading of the bill. I understand an objection can be made to the consideration of the bill at any time before its reading is completed.

Mr. KING. Is this the bill which was before the Senate a day or two ago and which passed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; this bill was taken up some time ago, when it was read and amended.

Mr. KING. Is this the measure which the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] presented to the Senate for consideration?

Mr. VARDAMAN. No; the Senator from Arkansas presented a bill increasing the salaries of inspectors of locomotive boilers and of machinery on railroads. This bill provides only for the inspectors of steamboats.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will not ask for the consideration of the bill this afternoon. I know that a number of Senators, upon my assurance that another bill would immediately follow the one which has just been passed, left the Chamber.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is not thought that this bill will involve any debate.

Mr. KING. I understand that it is a bill to largely increase salaries.

Mr. HARDWICK. No.

Mr. VARDAMAN. No, Mr. President; it does not largely increase salaries. This is the first bill, I am advised, increasing the salaries of these men in 40 years. The bill has the ardent support of the Secretary of Commerce, and I might say is the companion bill to the one which we passed day before yesterday for the railroads. Identically the same principle is involved. The bill has been before the Senate for months, and the Secretary of the Department of Commerce thinks it ought to be passed.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator from Mississippi a question?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I shall be glad to answer the Senator.

Mr. KING. I suppose the bill involves taking money out of the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, the occupants of the offices created by law, of course, are not required to work for nothing. This bill increases the salaries somewhat.

Mr. KING. It proposes an increase of compensation?

Mr. VARDAMAN. It proposes an increased compensation; and I will say to the Senator that, as I am advised, it is the first time in 40 years. The Senator will observe, if he will investigate the matter, that the increase is not out of proportion at all, nor is it inconsistent with the labor to be performed and the demands of the service of the Government.

Mr. KING. It pays a compensation, as I understand, of $5,000 for steamboat-boiler inspectors.

Mr. VARDAMAN. One of the salaries is $3,400; but there is only one $5,000 salary in it. Some of these inspectors are paid $2,500, $2,300, and $2,100. As I have stated, we have amended the bill so as to conform to the House bill fixing the salaries as they were fixed in the bill, which passed the other House, as I understand, unanimously.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. There is only one $5,000 salary, which is, I suppose, for the Chief of the Steamboat-Inspection Service. All the others range between $1,800 and $2,500. There are 11 inspectors, the country being divided into 11 districts. This provides for an increase of one district, to include Alaskan waters. The increase in salaries is very moderate compared with other salaries.

I want to say further and reiterate what the Senator from Mississippi has said, that this is the first increase in 40 years in the salaries of these men. It is their duty to inspect—and they will have extra work now—all the hulls and boilers of the new ships that we are building. Their work will be greatly increased over what it ever has been before.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I think I was under a misapprehension when I asked that the bill be read. I was under the impression that the Senator from Mississippi asked unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill. I understand now the Senator moved to proceed to the consideration of the bill, did he not?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I did.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then, of course, I do not call for the reading of the bill. The Senator has the right to make that motion, and the bill will be read after the motion is carried, if it is carried.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On May 17 the bill was read, amended, and carried over for further consideration. Now the Senator from Mississippi makes the motion that the Senate proceed to its further consideration.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. I shall not offer any factious opposition to the motion made by the Senator from Mississippi to proceed to the immediate consideration of the measure to which he referred, although I am convinced that we are not dealing with an important question in a broad and comprehensive manner. However, I am beginning to appreciate the fact that with the present views of the Senate opposition to measures that call for governmental appropriations will receive but little support. Bills that increase salaries or make heavy drafts upon the Treasury meet with but little, if any, obstacles to their passage. It is so easy to defend any bill that calls for an appropriation, and it is an ungracious task, as well as an unpopular one, to oppose such measures. I know that many salaries paid to Government employees are inadequate, and I believe that there should be a fair and reasonable adjustment of salaries and that important increases should be made in the compensation paid many of those who are now in the service of our Government. But I want to call attention to the fact that to deal with this question in this piecemeal fashion is very unwise and will be productive of very unfortunate results. I should like to see, as stated, a broad and comprehensive measure introduced to deal in a proper and just way with the entire subject. But Senators will recognize the unwisdom of taking up in this spasmodic and piecemeal fashion the question of salaries and compensations to be paid Government employees. If a bill is passed to-day dealing with only a few employees in some branch of the service, it will at once arouse demands from other departments, bureaus, and branches for increases in compensation, and if these demands are responded to, and separate bills are passed dealing with the separate demands, it will be impossible to harmonize the compensation paid, or to consider all of the elements relating to the question, and which should be considered as a basis for fixing compensation. Some employees of the Government will get too much, measured by what is paid to others, and these apparent, if not real, discriminations will provoke controversy, lead to resentment, and culminate in the introduction of additional special bills to deal with special cases and with a limited number of employees; and so, instead of bringing contentment, piecemeal legislation will provoke discontent and keep a subject, which ought to be disposed of, constantly before the legislative branch of the Government. Mr. President, to deal with the question of compensation and salaries of governmental employees of our country in minute bills, in special measures, is unfortunate, and, as I have stated, will cause difficulties and grievances which we will yet have to meet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. VARDAMAN and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, the Senate passed a bill day before yesterday increasing the salaries of railroad locomotive inspectors. As was stated by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] a moment ago, the duties imposed upon the steamboat inspectors have been multiplied, and the responsibilities resting upon them are enormous. The Secretary of Commerce, in discussing this question, says:

> This bill has my unqualified support. It proposes to increase the salaries of the inspectors, which I think should be done. The men in that service are thoroughly equipped and trained for this work, and, in my opinion, are underpaid. Further, because of the unusual demand at the present time for men outside of the service having the equipment and training of those in it, it will be quite difficult to hold the latter unless something is done to make their employment inviting and their pay commensurate with the duties performed.

The United States Government has no right to ask any citizen to render service for less compensation than that service is worth. It is a fact, I am told, that the salaries of these men have not been increased for 40 years, and the increased cost of living and the multiplied duties and responsibilities imposed upon them, I think, justify an increase of their salaries at this time. The laborer is worthy of his hire, and the passage of this bill will only do justice to a number of earnest, honest, patient public servants.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not care very much about the fate of this particular bill, although I think it ought to pass, and I shall vote for its passage. I think that the arguments made in favor of its passage are sound and have hitherto been unanswered.

I rise mainly for the purpose of denying, so far as I am concerned, the allegation made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the effect that "in the present mood or temper of the United States Senate resistance to any appropriation bill would be vain and hopeless." So far as I am concerned, that is absolutely an unwarranted charge against the membership of the Senate. I shall not vote during the war for any appropriation that I do not think to be necessary or advisable, any more than I would vote in peace times for an appropriation on the same account. Of course, there are things that during a time of war are necessary and advisable which during a time of peace would be neither necessary nor advisable.

After taking issue with the Senator from Utah upon that charge against the sense of economy that ought to exist in this body, and which I think does exist, then I want to take issue with a phrase of my colleague. He says that "the Government has no right to call upon any man for service at less compensation than the service is worth." Do Senators realize what that means—that the States, that the Government, that one's native land, that one's mother country has no right to call upon one for service unless due compensation in money is paid? What shall become of the private soldiers in the United States Army, some of whom are millionaires, a great many of whom are cotton-plantation owners, and a great many of whom are living upon an income of anywhere from $2,000 to $10,000 a year?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the senior Senator from Mississippi yield to his colleague?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I thought I said "service of the character" which the steamboat boiler inspector performs.

Mr. WILLAMS. The Senator did not so state.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, if I did not say that, of course I intended to refer to civil employees.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator did not say that; but if he had said it, it would have made no difference. The Republic has the right to call upon every man for any service that he can perform. If he is too old or too young to perform military or naval service, then he can perform some other service; and if the Republic needs him for it, then he must serve, and he has no right to bargain with the Republic on the basis of what he formerly received in that or some other employment. Nobody has a right to bargain with his mother about doing his duty in her protection. He must protect her against any or all odds.

As I was about to say, what becomes of the private soldier? What shall become of the yeoman in the Navy? What shall become of the lieutenants in the Navy? There are Senators here who have boys who are graduates of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology who could obtain the very first year after they had graduated two or three times the pay they receive as lieutenants in the Army or Navy.

I am a little bit tired of this constant profiteering. Although I disagree with the Senator from Utah with regard to his vote upon this particular bill, I do agree with him in the substance and the meaning of what he said. It seems to me that every man in the United States wants "a raise" out of the Government somewhere or somehow. Men in civil office come begging it hat in hand; the Civil War veterans come begging it hat in hand; the men who are engaged in ordinary Government or commercial employment come begging it hat in hand; the men who are selling bananas come begging it hat in hand; the men who are selling cotton come begging it hat in hand; the men who are selling wheat come begging it hat in hand; the men who are employed as stenographers come hat in hand asking of the Government $1,400 a year, when the Senate is paying to stenographers only $1,200. I for one have grown tired of "patrioteering" when it is synonymous with "profiteering." I deny the right of any man to say that he shall serve the Republic only upon the condition that he gets as much as he could get somewhere or somehow else.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator ought to include one other class who come with a club in their hands.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, Mr. President, I am glad the Senator made that suggestion. The Senator is right. If there is any difference between the two classes, the class that I have described is less reprehensible than the class to which the Senator has referred. Here we have the power to make men within certain ages go into the Army or into the Navy, whichever they choose, and serve for the pay of a private soldier, and a great many of these very men now have read the riot act to us and told us that, although they are getting ten times the pay of a private soldier, unless they got twenty times that pay they will establish a strike or unless they can pay less they will inaugurate a lockout. I put the lockout in with the strike. I am tired of it. The American people are tired of it. There are just two classes of people in America to-day—the men who want to win this war at any hazard and the men of the other class, who are either disloyal or nonloyal or lukewarm; the men who spend their energies, not in encouraging the American people, but in criticizing the American administration; the men who have in past times or now said that this is "a Wall Street war," "a rich man's war," "a capitalists' war," and who have uttered a lot of other unspeakable lies of that description. I care not whether the lieing utterance was before or after we went in to defend American honor—defamed and insulted. I differ with the Senator from Utah about this particular bill; I think it ought to pass, but I agree with him in his arraignment of the profiteers who pretend to be patriots and are patrioteers, and who every day are calling upon the United States Treasury for greater and greater and yet greater appropriations.

It is for me a matter of honor as well as a matter of pleasure to denounce and defy and even insult people who think that in war times, when the whole Republic is at stake, they or others for whom they speak must be as well off as they were in peace times. I am not as well off. You are not as well off. The ordinary citizen is not. The Government is taking its share of our share of the general profits, and the Government ought to take it. If you can not put your life in the trenches, then you have got to put your pocketbook there, and there are two ways of putting your pocketbook there. One is to pay taxes as far as the necessities of the Government demand their levying, and the other, if you are a Government employee, is—and it is just as important—to live, if possible, on what you are already earning, without asking the Government for any more. I am disgusted with the conduct of the civil-service employees of the United States Government in the city of Washington, who are asking more and more and yet more, like that woman in the Bible, who never was satisfied. Many of these people are earning more now than they ever earned in their lives before. Even the Senate and House employees are in this great movement. Everybody wants something more.

Why, I heard not many weeks ago that there would be a movement to recoup Senators and Congressmen, because of the 6 per cent tax they paid by increasing their salaries. Of course, it amounted to nothing. Of course, you could not get half a dozen men in either House to stand for that sort of a disloyal proposition; but the mere fact that it was mentioned shows the general tendency to spoliate the Government. We have given to the President power to put square pegs in square holes and round pegs in round holes.

By the way, that reminds me that not long ago, when I referred to that, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] grew very witty, and not only witty but very intelligent besides that, upon the subject of square pegs and round holes and round pegs and square holes, and displayed the very utmost possibility of knowledge upon that subject. He made one of the wittiest, one of the cleverest, and one of the most humorous speeches that has been made in the United States Senate in 25 years.

The Senator displayed the very absolute utmost of knowledge concerning pegs and holes, but he also displayed the utmost and most absolute want of knowledge concerning civil-service rules, regulations, and laws limiting Executive discretion that I ever have witnessed since I have been a Member of this body or of the other body. He seemed to think that the President already had a right, notwithstanding the civil-service laws, to do whatever he pleased with the employees of the Government. The Constitution made the President the executive power and gave him the right to appoint the other members of the executive branch of the Government; but Congress, with the approval of various Presidents, curtailed that power until Theodore Roosevelt once told me, when I went to him to try to get an old Confederate veteran kept in at one time: "WILLIAMS, if you will point out to me a single place in this Government that I can control regardless of any law, I will give you a chromo. I want a place or two myself."

That was the knowledge of a President faced with a situation, not the want of knowledge of a facetious peg-and-hole Senator. The knowledge of the Senator from Illinois was very little as regards the law, although the Senator from Illinois displayed a very diligent study of pegs and holes, and there, anent, developed an amount of information that I never even suspected that any human being could possess or carry, like Goldsmith's parson, in one small head. I want to pay my tribute to him now as a man of wit and intelligence and humor and thorough purpose when it comes to pegs and holes and also my tribute to him as a man of absolute ignorance of the circumlocutions and limitations that surround the President of the United States with regard to the appointment of men to executive offices, or did surround him until we passed the law against which the Senator from Illinois inveighed and voted.

Now, we have passed the law and the President has had the responsibility thrown upon him, and if the President does not respond to it, and does not put square pegs in square holes and round pegs in round holes, then he can be criticized.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say this upon the bill itself: I come from the part of the country where these people chiefly serve. I am informed that while every other salary, even in peace times, was rising either annually or every five years or decennially, for about 40 years these people have had no raise at all. Their duty is of the utmost importance and responsibility. Not a steamboat goes out on the Ohio or Mississippi River whose passengers and crew do not depend absolutely upon the expert knowledge of these steamboat-boiler inspectors, and these men ought to have an increase of salary, and if this matter had come up in peace times I would have voted for it with as thorough a conviction as I vote for it now.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I understand that there is a general concurrence that when we adjourn we shall adjourn until Monday. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

SALARIES OF STEAMBOAT INSPECTORS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2104.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am compelled to attend a meeting at the Western High School in a very few moments, and I want to speak for just a moment upon the bill, and then I shall have no objection to having the bill taken up.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Let us take it up, and then the Senator can speak.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall be glad to have that done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2104) to amend sections 4402, 4404, and 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the other day when this bill was up I took the position that the salaries provided for in this bill had been increased by the Appropriations Committee on different occasions and that the Secretary of Commerce had asked the Appropriations Committee to increase those salaries at this time; and as the Appropriations Committee was not increasing salaries in the legislative appropriation bill, of course, it refused to increase these. I rise now simply to say that it is a mistake to say that these salaries have not been increased for 40 years, and I want to call attention to some of them that have been increased, in order that the RECORD may show it, and then the Senate can do as it pleases about the bill.

First, take the Supervising Inspector General. His salary 40 years ago, or when the bill creating the office was passed, was $3,500. It was increased to $4,000 by the Appropriations Committee, and the pending bill provides for its increase now to $5,000.

Mr. VARDAMAN. When was the increase made?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I did not make a note of the exact dates.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want the Senator to understand that my statement was taken from the report of the House commitee.

Mr. SMOOT. I am giving the Senate the facts, and I am not going to say anything further about the bill. I simply want the RECORD to show that these employees of the Government have been treated the same as other employees, wherever the case has been presented to the Appropriation Committee in such a way that they thought an increase ought to be made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I desire to say, in justice to myself, that when I said their salaries had not been increased for 40 years I did not say it upon the basis of any research that I had made, but upon the basis of the statement made by my colleague and upon the basis of the report that I understood had been made by the committee; and if those are in error, of course, I am in error.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when the first bill passed the inspector of the district of Michigan received $900, and under this bill his salary is $2,500.

The salary of the inspector at the port of Albany was originally $1,200, and now it is $2,500.

The salary of the inspector at Portland, Me., was $1,200, and now it is $2,500.

The salary of the inspector at Oswego, N. Y., was $800, and now it is $2,350.

And so I might go along the line.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Are any of them from the South—the Mississippi River?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; there is Charleston, S. C. That salary was $1,200, and under this bill it is $2,100.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What about the Mississippi River? I think those salaries have been the same for a generation.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the Senator is utterly mistaken about Charleston. The salary there is $1,500.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I say that the original salary, under the law as it originally passed, was $1,200; and if the Senator wants me to do so, I will have the law here, and I can read it. I know that since then the salary has been increased to $1,500, but I say the original law provided for a salary of $1,200, and I was going to call attention then to the increases since the law was originally passed; and perhaps I might as well do it now, as I pass along.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. In a word, will the Senator explain the duties of these men and what reason there is for such a large increase?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to my colleague that there is a reason for an increase in their salaries because of the great number of ships that are being built at these ports, and, of course, the responsibility of examining the boilers and the ship itself is greater than it has been in the past; and that is the reason why they are asking for the increase. All I wanted to do was to correct the statements made that there have been no increases for 40 years, because we often hear that statement made in the discussions that there have been no increases in the salaries since the positions were first established.

Take the assistant inspectors in New York: The original salary was $2,000, and to-day it is $2,000, and under this bill it is $2,500.

In New Orleans, La., the salary originally was $1,600. To-day it is $1,800, and under this bill it is $2,100.

In Boston, the original salary was $1,600. It was increased to $2,000, and under this bill it is $2,100.

At Chicago the original salary was $1,600, and it has remained $1,600 until this time. The pending bill increases it to $2,100 a year.

In the case of the clerks that were authorized to be appointed, under the original law their salary was $1,200, and it has been kept at $1,200 until this time. The pending bill increases their salary to $1,500.

I simply wanted to say that much, Mr. President, in order to place in the RECORD the situation as it is to-day and to show partially how the Appropriations Committee have increased these salaries from the time the law was originally passed. That is all that I have to say about the bill. I, as well as other Senators, know that while some of the increases are exceedingly large, they are only large where shipbuilding has become a very important industry in the State in which the port is located, and, of course, in consequence there are additional duties devolving upon these men; and that is the reason why the increases in this bill were asked.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I agree most earnestly and heartily with the remark of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that no American citizen who has a drop of patriotic blood in his veins ought to hold up the Government in any way in this time of dire trouble and necessity, but I submit to the Senator that under the present conditions there is a circumstance which would seem to justify the Congress itself in making this increase.

I know the Senator will agree with me that the element which affects the price of commodities which every American citizen must purchase to a greater degree than any other element is the question of the labor cost of production. That is the first and most important element to consider. Now, if the Government itself, by its own act, whether it is done through an idea of necessity or otherwise, so increases the initial cost of everything that must be purchased, how can the Government excuse itself from increasing the salaries of those persons whose salaries were fixed upon the basis of the cost of living at the time they were established?

For instance, let me take the Senator's own State, or let me take the adjoining State of Virginia. Before the war your Virginia colored man received from a dollar and a half to two dollars a day for the lowest class of labor. Now, that lowest class of labor fixed the price of the commodities which most of the salaried people had to purchase. Then came the Government, and immediately, without any real necessity—because it had the power to call upon all of its citizens to perform services for the Government—the several branches of the Government began to bid against each other, until they raised the price of the lower class of labor from 200 to 400 per cent.

Let me give a little illustration. Here is a poster that is being sent out by the Post Office Department all over this country, and especially here in the Southern States. It is a bid to the colored laborers on the farms to leave the farms and come to the cities. This is the way it reads:

Uncle Sam needs you! Work for the Government! The United States Government wants a thousand laborers in its navy yard at Norfolk, Va., to back up the fleet. Four dollars and forty cents for 10 hours; free transportation and sleeping quarters. For information, apply at the post office.

Then here is a circular letter sent to every postmaster in Virginia and every postmaster in Maryland and the adjoining States. Here is the first paragraph:

There is urgent need for a thousand unskilled laborers—

Not skilled laborers, but unskilled laborers—

at the navy yard at Norfolk, Va. Unskilled laborers there are paid 40 cents an hour for 8 hours, with time and a half for overtime work. They are now working a 10-hour shift, which brings the pay to $4.40 for 10 hours.

Posted right alongside of that is another notice appealing to the farmers of Virginia and Maryland to work day and night, any number of hours that may be necessary, to produce the greatest quantity of grain they can possibly produce to support this war.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator contend that it is not the first duty of the United States Government to get labor at the Government's price, if possible, at the shipbuilding yards and at the munitions plants, in order that we may win this war?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is my view——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator contend that that is not the duty of the United States Government? I did not ask his view.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; but I was stating my view of the duty of the United States Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, if the Senator confesses that that is the first duty of the United States Government, then I should like to know, in keeping with his argument and mine—both of which run upon all fours—what right there is upon the part of anybody who incidentally suffers by it to complain?

Mr. McCUMBER. The point is this: There was no necessity of the several departments bidding against each other. If the departments had started out in the beginning and fixed a scale of wages that was just and fair, and then had insisted, as they are insisting now, that there shall be no idle men, that they must either go into the trench or into the workshops or onto the farms, they would not have increased the cost of living to double and treble what it was before the war.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, I agree with the Senator that every able-bodied man within the limitations of those that are called upon by the Government either ought to be at work or ought to be in the Army. I also agree with what I believe is the Senator's opinion, although not yet expressed, that wherever a man who is within the draft age and in Government pay is striking for higher pay, which in the opinion of the Government is unreasonable, he ought to be conscripted and put to work on a private soldier's pay or else sent to the trenches. I think the Senator will agree with me about that. But I do not agree with the Senator that "the different departments of the Government have been bidding against one another." They have been bidding together for labor.

Furthermore, the Senator says that the Government at the beginning of the war "ought to have established a wage rate and kept by it." The Senator surely must know that the Government could not do that; that it never has been able to do it; that the wage rate has been fixed by the labor of the United States in its unions, and outside its unions, too; and that the Government has been compelled to meet it. The Government either had to leave the ships unbuilt and the munitions unmanufactured, or it had to meet the demands made for wages by labor.

Now, of course, the Senator might denounce labor as unpatriotic for making too great demands. That is a different proposition. It is subject to argument upon both sides; but the Government of the United States is not a subject of denunciation because it paid what it had to pay, and it has not bid any more for labor than it had to bid; and to prove that it has not even yet got the labor it needs, notwithstanding all of its bids.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, in principle I agree entirely with the Senator. Our only difference is upon the facts to which we apply that principle. I insist, first, from as careful consideration and paying as much attention to the conditions as is possible for me to do, that the several departments are unnecessarily competing with each other. My second proposition is that the Government now, in many of the places where it employs labor, is using a far greater number of laborers than it can actually give work to; and I instanced the other day places where perhaps 10 men were doing the work that 2 men really ought to do.

Now, Mr. President, in my opinion it was not necessary, and, in my opinion, it is not necessary to-day to send out notices of this character over the country. I believe in conscripting, not labor but the manhood and the womanhood, if necessary, of the American people and utilizing it in the service of the country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Here is what I want to get at, and then I will yield to the Senator. When you fix the price of this colored labor at $4.40 a day, with sleeping apartments, you take that labor from the farmer of Maryland and the farmer of Virginia, and then you tell the farmer to pay that price for that kind of labor and produce his wheat for $2.20 a bushel. Now, that is the injustice. If you are going to fix the price according to the demand of labor, then you ought to allow the price of the product of the farmer's labor to be determined by the demand.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. President, the Senator's argument would be sound if the premise were granted that the United States Government could use all the labor that is needed or ordinarily employed upon the farms. But the United States Government can not use one-hundredth part of it. It is calling for the best labor at the highest price, which is merely the fulfillment of an old Jeffersonian Democratic theory that the higher the per diem price the more efficient the labor is. In fulfillment of that the Government of the United States wants the most efficient labor possible.

Those notices have been sent to my plantation in Mississippi. They have been sent to other people, and a great many of the most intelligent negro men, the most skillful and alert and wide-awake have left the farms and gone to Government employ. Why not, if I could not afford to pay what the Government had to pay? I think that is a blessing in disguise for the entire South, because I think it leads to the purchase of machinery, it leads to the running of traction engines, traction plows, and all that, as a substitute for brute negro man power, or man power of any unskilled sort—white or black.

At home I have been able to do the work of about four men and six mules with a traction engine. It is teaching us. In the meanwhile the United States Government culls the labor, and the Government in behalf of the life of the Republic ought to be allowed to cull the labor. In the meanwhile all that accrues to the benefit of the labor, whether black or white, accrues to the public benefit.

Now, the Senator knows as well as I that there can be no prosperity in any country that begins at the top and goes down to the bottom. It must begin at the bottom and go up to the top. If this Government can effect a revolution whereby the ordinary negro labor of the South can be made prosperous, it will bring prosperity to the entire South.

Now, I am not complaining of it. I have been put to it, and put to it like the dickens. My son, who has been running the home farm, has been put to it. As a consequence he has had to go out himself and work in the sun all day long with a traction engine dragging plows or a harvester. But it is all for the best in the long run and it is all leading up to this, Mr. President, that the better the distribution of wealth the better it is for the country, taking more and more from the man who has too much, whether he be a cotton planter like me or a cotton manufacturer in New England, and giving a larger share of it to the labor upon which as a basis his prosperity is founded.

Mr. McCUMBER. We are on common ground again.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One of the great things that is going to happen as the result of this war is that we will never again look upon wealth in exactly the way we have looked upon it hitherto. We will look upon it as a trust for the benefit of the Republic and civilization, and we will look upon a man who has a little bit too much as a man who ought to contribute a little bit more in order to help the world along, and if a man has a little bit too little as a man who ought to be given a little more in order that he may help the world along.

I am a cotton planter in Mississippi. I have been hurt upon my home farm, where I am cultivating some 1,400 acres. I raised only twenty-odd bales of cotton there last year. I raise cattle, and I raise hogs, and I raise sheep and soy beans and corn and velvet beans and oats and various things. I did the best I could. Of course I did not make as much money out of it as I could have made with all cotton at 30 cents a pound. I had no right to make as much.

I do not subscribe to the idea that I have got to get the same revenue out of my means of existence in the United States when the Republic is in trouble as I had a right to get when the Republic was at peace. I have no regard for the man who thinks he ought to get that much, or who for demagogic or vote-getting purpose as an officeholder or office seeker contends that other people ought to get that much. Our sons in France would have a right to despise us who are at home if that were our contention, when they are venturing their lives—priceless in mere money value.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator's arguments always contribute great value to any discussion, even though they sometimes put him in something of an inconsistent attitude. The Senator says that the Government is seeking the highest class of labor and paying the highest price for that highest class of labor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. To enable it to cull the unskilled labor market.

Mr. McCUMBER. So it appears; but the Government is not stopping there. It is paying the highest price for the lowest class of labor, and even that——

Mr. WILLIAMS. But, Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. I gave the Senator considerable time and I will give him more. Even that I am not seriously objecting to, provided that the Government will allow that law of compensation to seep through all American society. If the Government fixed the salary of a clerk at $900 or $1,200 a year, when the price of this lower class of labor was about $500 a year, then when the Government itself, by its own activities, raises the price of this lower class of labor to $1,500 a year, thereby increasing to that extent the cost of living of the clerk who spent years in getting an education to enable him or her to earn $900 to $1,200 a year, I insist that the Government ought to take that into consideration in increasing the salary of the clerk so that the clerk may be able to meet the higher cost of living that has been created by the Government itself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just there——

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me finish the sentence. Take the $4.40 a day that the negro down in Virginia is now offered, together with a sleeping place. At 26 days' labor in a month, that gives him $124.40 a month. That means $1,482.80 a year, while the average white clerk who has had to educate himself is working for the Government for all the way from $75 to $100 per month.

You have increased the cost of your negro labor to such an extent, let me tell the Senator, that they are able to live on four days' labor in the week and lie off the other two days. They are doing that for the most part, thereby curtailing production and thereby increasing the cost of living. The only reason, I say to the Senator candidly, that would justify me in voting to increase the salaries is not because they are coming with open hands begging for it, but because I think it is the duty of the Government to fix a salary that will compare with the cost of living, especially when the Government itself, as I view it, is responsible to a great extent for the higher cost of living.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator—answering the last thing he said first—this "lying off" because the laborer is securing so much more wage than he had hitherto secured, is a thing that attracts the attention of the economist only during the transitory period. If you take a man who is receiving a dollar a day and give him $2 a day, his first temptation is to lie off on Friday and Saturday and to make a little bit more money during the balance of the week than he made formerly during the whole week while doing two days' less work. But very soon after that the fact that he has more money than he ever had before arouses new desires and new appetites and new wants and a higher standard of living, and the moment all that is aroused he begins to find that his new wage meets his new wants just about as well as the old wage met his old wants. That is the argument at the bottom of the undoubted economic principle that the highest priced labor is always the most efficient labor, and that the cheapest labor by the day always is the most inefficient and therefore the most expensive. The Senator hires in North Dakota men at $50 a month to work for him raising wheat, and down here in Virginia they hire an ignorant uninitiative negro laborer at $25 a month to do the same thing. In the Valley of Virginia they have a superior soil to his, and notwithstanding that he with his efficient and intelligent labor can beat the Virginia farmer in the wheat market on the net results every year. I hire in Mississippi men—who are negro men, generally—to do my work, and I pay about $25 to $30 a month, counting their keep and their cabin and their garden and their wood and everything. Others hire men to raise cotton in Egypt at 14 cents a day, in India men at 8 cents a day, and yet with me upon the quarterdeck and my negro laborers well fed on corn and bacon and peas at the gun I can beat Egypt and India raising cotton every week in the year, and I have done it, and my ancestors before me for very nearly a hundred years. Why? Because the heart of the laborer here is singing with hope. He thinks he is going to rise some time. Even the ordinary negro laborer thinks he is going to be something beyond what he is right now, in wages if in nothing else, and the white man, intelligent and initiated, whom the Senator employs, knows he is, and can beat any negro laborer in net productive gain, when he pays them twice as much as I do. Why? Because his labor is much more efficient, is much more in earnest, is much more honest, works better, and because the idea of giving an honest day's work for an honest day's pay is better lodged in his brain, so that he does not necessitate as great an overhead charge for supervision and watching. Now, so much for that.

The second fallacy that the Senator has committed is this: He says the Government, if it bids for unskilled labor, ought to go ahead and increase the wage of clerks, and all that. I tell the Senator again the Government has nothing directly to do with the pay of any clerks, except Government clerks. The Government is already paying ordinary stenographers $1,400 a year. As a consequence, I find it almost impossible to find a competent stenographer in my office for a place now vacant at $1,200, which the Senate grants me to pay.

The Senator says if the Government does what he says with regard to one species of labor, it ought to do it with another. What will happen in the case I have instanced? If the Government continues to raise that wage for a stenographer and mine continues by resolution of the Senate to remain where it is, all the best stenographers will go to the Government and I will get "the leavings" or I will get nobody. That is as plain as that 2 and 2 make 4. There can not be any dispute about it.

The Senator says that when you increase the wages of farm labor and do not increase the wages of clerks for people outside engaged in commerce, and all that, it is unjust and inconsistent. There are two fallacies involved in that. The first is the supposition that the Government is trying to fix the wages of anybody except the people whom the Government employs. That is the first fallacy.

The second fallacy is that when the Government does fix wages of the people whom it employs its action has no effect upon other people doing like work. It does have effect upon other people's wages.

Say the Government employs one-twentieth of what would otherwise be the agricultural labor of the country in the shipbuilding yards and in the munition plants. The Government does not, as the Senator says, "appeal to the lowest labor." It appeals to unskilled labor, but in the army of unskilled labor it is the best labor with the most intelligence and the most initiative and the most ambition that leaves the farm and goes to a Government munition plant or to a Government shipbuilding plant. So the Government culls the best and highest, not the lowest, unskilled labor.

Now, what is the effect upon the balance of unskilled labor? It is that you and I have got to offer higher wages. So it does have its effect upon other people.

Now, what is the effect upon the clerk in a store? If the amount paid by the Government or the wages on your farm get to be more than they are for the clerk, unless the clerk is a fool he will go out and go to work on a farm or in a shipyard, unskilled as he is, and do the best he can.

But there is another principle, just as with the junkers and professors in Germany. Professors in the universities serve as officers in the army at one-half, sometimes one-third, of what they could get in other avocations. Why? Because they have a profession which gives social status and are not classed as menials or manual laborers. This country is full of men who would rather practice law or practice medicine at $600 a year than work in a ditch at $1,200, just as Prussia is full of men who would rather be lieutenants in the army at a salary that would surprise you because of its insignificance rather than to be manufacturers or farmers at three times the amount of money, because a man can be a rath and his wife can be a rathin, and they possess a certain status in society.

That is the case in America. The lawyers and doctors and clerks who are not daily manual laborers represent a state of things that ought not to exist but does exist. Some day the time will come when the man who carries a hod filled with 50 bricks will receive as much social recognition as the judge of the court who earns less money than he does. But that time has not come yet, and the judge is not willing to swap places. Here are men at Hog Island earning $10 a day, some of them $15, a few $20. There is not a judge on the bench in Mississippi who is paid $2,500 a year who would be willing to swap places with the laborer at Hog Island even if he could tote as many bricks. It is a question of social status for himself, but far more than that, for his wife and children. Man lives no more by money alone than by bread alone. Men will fight for $30 a month who would not work for three or five times as much.

Now, the thing the Senator made a mistake about is this, and it is the big thing: This Government has nothing to do, and ought to have nothing to do, with the wage of labor except in so far as the labor is employed by the Government. It has everything to do with that, and thus far it has not fixed the wage, but has met the wage that labor has demanded, and which for the most part labor demanded because the Government was getting this culled unskilled labor and ought to pay more than the ordinary wage for unskilled labor.

I remember when I first came back from school and went to work on a cotton plantation the ordinary wage around there was $12.50 a month besides supplies, and the garden, and the wood, and the balance of it. I said to my manager, "What are you paying?" He said, "$12.50." I said, "Offer $15." The neighbors nearly held a riot meeting upon it. I said, "I want culled labor. I want to be able to say to the laborer on my plantation, 'If you do not do to suit me, you have got to leave my employ.' I do not want to be put in the fix of my labor saying to me, 'If you do not do to suit me, I will leave.'" After a while my neighbors found I did not want all the labor in the county, nor in the township or precinct even, but just a small part of it. I culled the labor. I got men I could rely upon—the best colored labor upon the creek, and the colored labor stood by me all the time, until I made an ass of myself by seeking and accepting public office.

It is the same thing with the Government. The Government is not fixing the price of labor except in so far as the Government employs certain laborers, and the Government is not fixing even that wage except by bargaining with the labor, and thus far the labor has had the best of the bargain. When it comes down to a solid rock basis he ought to have it. Why? Because the Government is not getting the ordinary unskilled labor, not the lowest labor, as the Senator said, but the best, the most ambitious, the most enterprising, and the most intelligent and the most initiative labor of that class—those who are willing to leave a cotton plantation and their accustomed work and go to work for a higher wage at a new sort of work. The ordinary fellow is like the fellow who stayed back in Europe. The culled labor is like our ancestors who came here. The ordinary fellow is afraid of new environments. He is afraid of the Indians. He is afraid of the wilderness. He is afraid of almost anything, and prefers to stay with his "cousins and his uncles and his aunts"; but when he stayed there he just simply kept staying as his descendents kept staying, and both staying still. They did not improve much. We Americans are not a superior people except in courage and initiative and invention. Why are we superior in those respects? Simply because the adventurers, and the inventors, and the reckless and the bold and the brave were willing to commit themselves to the wilderness. Go upon an ordinary cotton plantation. There is the ordinary laborer named Jim, who says, "I do not want to go to any munitions plant. It might blow me up." Tom and Dick say, "I do not know anything about building those ships. I am going to stay right here." Pete, who is an extra negro, says, "Look here, that looks like $4, and I am going to try it on anyhow."

It is just the same in principle and motive as the man who came from Norway, the man who came from Scotland, the man who came from England, the man who came from Switzerland to the United States, who said, "If I can succeed, I can start a family; I will be the sire of a generation of people and I will be looked up to." The other fellow was willing to stay in Europe and in the rut and willing to be looked down on—"nothing venturing, nothing winning."

By the way, I am a little tired of the constant criticism of the Government. I expect some of you are getting a little ashamed of criticizing the Secretary of War. You have already gotten ashamed of criticizing the Secretary of the Navy. You started to ridicule him as a North Carolina country editor who did not know anything about anything at all, much less a Navy, and now you are all in loud acclaim of him. Every now and then a certain degree of northeastern arrogance flows out of people's sweat nerves when we do not even know it is coming. "Of course," the Jews said, "there could no good come from Nazareth." What are you going to do with the man who comes from Raleigh, N. C.? That is worse than Nazareth, in New York and New England opinion. He has made good, has he not? You do not dare say he has not; not any of you. A few little lieutenants and lieutenant commanders and admirals and commodores in the Navy got mad with him because he shut off the wine at their mess and told them they ought to treat private sailors a little more politely. But even they acclaim him now.

The same thing will happen with regard to the Secretary of War. In less than three weeks you will be praising him here and in your newspapers. While you were criticizing him for very dire and almost inexcusable mistakes that have been made by the Signal Corps—all West Pointers—and in the aircraft construction service, he was putting 800,000 men in France.

My dear friends, let us think about the good things we are doing. I saw the other day that somebody out West had started a society, and the society had only one pledge; a fellow just signed a certificate to this effect, "I hereby certify that I really do not believe that I could have run this war to everybody's satisfaction." Everyone who was willing to sign that, whether a Socialist, Populist, Republican, or Independent, was allowed to become a member of the society.

A man's real heart intent is to be judged by his bias. A man with a bias against what we are trying to do is naturally ready to criticize. A man with a bias in favor of what we are trying to do is naturally ready to praise. The Democratic platform in Indiana the other day was exactly right. Everything dropped to the cardinal first principle of winning this war. I said this on the floor of the Senate, and the funny part of it is that I was accused of partisanship for saying it; I said I would vote for any man, Republican or Populist, who was heart and soul in favor of winning this war, neither disloyal nor nonloyal nor lukewarm—before it began or now—in preference to the most ultra Democrat of opposing bias who ever existed if he were nominated in my own State. Catch me the man who is fault-finding, and I will catch you the man who is at the best lukewarm in loyalty and self-devotion. Catch me the man who is a bit too optimistic, and I will catch you the man who is, at the worst, overzealous for the American Republic.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to occupy about 30 minutes, I will state to Members. That will be 4.30, and it will leave a half hour in which desired matters before adjourning over until Monday may be attended to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator let me interrupt him for a moment? There is one matter that we should bring before the Senate before it adjourns to-day, upon which I hope the Senate will act. It is the position with reference to the Agricultural appropriation bill. It is exceedingly important that some action should be had on that bill. I am very anxious to take the sense of the Senate this evening as to whether the conferees should adhere to $2.50 wheat or whether we should recede from it, or whether the conferees should bring the subject back to the Senate and let the Senate determine just whether it desires it to adhere to $2.50 wheat or recede.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope the Senator will not attempt to press that this evening. It was expected that we would adjourn probably not later than 4 o'clock this afternoon, and I know a great many Senators who would like to be present and be heard upon that question are absent for the day. I do not think it would be possible to get a vote on it or even an expression of the Senate until late in the evening. I hope the Senator will let it go over until our next meeting.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would not the Senator be willing that the conferees should be requested to report the subject back to the Senate for consideration by the Senate? If that were done, without directing the conferees, we could on Monday determine what had better be done.

Mr. McCUMBER. A great many Senators are opposed to that, including myself.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Opposed to reporting it back?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am opposed to the matter coming back to the Senate at all. We wish to leave it with the committee until the committee itself can come to some kind of an agreement. Were it not for the fact that Senators are now absent who I know will not be present again this afternoon, I should not object, because I certainly do not wish to delay the matter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I called attention this morning to the fact that I would bring the subject up when the Senate disposed of the officers' retirement bill which was before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator from Georgia will allow me, as acting chairman——

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has the floor. Does the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. The conference report can not be disposed of, I am sure, without much debate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I merely want to make a statement.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to remind the Senator from Illinois now that if he yields to other Senators to debate the wheat question he will have a whole lot of yielding to do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, it is not a question of debate, and I am not going to debate it; but as the servant of this body, and being responsible to it, and as acting chairman of the committee, I think I ought to make a statement. I am not taking sides, pro or con.

I want to state that the conferees on the Agricultural appropriation bill have met time and time again; compromises have been offered but not even considered because of the attitude of the two sets of conferees. I see no possibility, nor does the Senator from Nebraska, that any compromise or any agreement will be reached without further instructions from their respective bodies. I can not get the conferees even to agree to that. The Agricultural appropriation bill is of tremendous importance, and some disposition will have to be made of the matter in dispute or the bill will lapse.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to be heard at some length on the conference report when it is taken up, as I apprehend would some other Senators from grain-producing States.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, would the Senator from Illinois yield to me for one moment to ask for a vote on the conference report on the river and harbor bill? It will require no debate.

Mr. SHERMAN. If it takes no time beyond the presentation of the conference report, I yield.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not want to discuss it at all. I simply want a vote on it.

Mr. SHERMAN. If it takes any time or statement or explanation, I should have to decline to yield. I will occupy just a limited time, I will say, about 30 minutes, and unless the Senate is anxious to adjourn early there will be half an hour left between the time I expect to occupy and 5 o'clock.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I want to say to the Senator from Illinois, and to other Senators, that it is quite important before we adjourn to-night that a short executive session be had.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will conduct myself accordingly, unless I am disturbed.

Mr. KING. If the Senator from Illinois will yield to me, I desire to say to the Senator from Nebraska that it is my purpose to present for consideration a very important administration bill as soon as this bill is out of the way, and I want to hold the Senate here until the bill is passed if it takes until midnight.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, when I conclude depends entirely on when I begin. I have not yet begun. I shall conduct myself very expeditiously, unless I am disturbed. If interruptions occur, I shall visit upon the Senate all the horrors that follow that parliamentary procedure. Otherwise, I shall reach in the time designated the end of my comments.

We have taken considerable time on what is not very vital—a mere matter of money—and, according to the old Spanish proverb, as the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] remarked at one time, gentlemen never quarrel about money. So it has been a friendly dispute all afternoon, Mr. President, and not on vital matters. The matter which I wish the Senate to consider between now and Monday, I consider to be a vital matter; one that might be before this body in 24 hours after we adjourn and upon our reconvening for action. It is not a mere matter of raising salaries or reducing them, but it is a matter of supreme consequence. The footfalls of it are heard across the continent now. It is one that I think that we had just as well concern ourselves with, and I shall take the 30 minutes, Mr. President, in so concerning myself between now and next Monday morning that we may have time for reflection.

Watchful waiting is an Executive phrase made to reconcile the American people to convulsive disturbances in Mexico, which broke over the border and destroyed life and property in the United States. Its immediate offspring was an abortive military expedition some hundreds of miles into Mexico. The practical effect was the loss of lives of American soldiers at the hands of Carranza's forces, the expenditure of some millions of dollars, and the creation of a belief among Mexicans that the United States was impotent either to assert itself or discipline bandits who invaded American territory. There remains throughout Mexico a thinly disguised contempt for the United States.

Again the administration is engaged in international watchful waiting. Unhappily, the second instance of waiting on the Russian situation is likely to be more disastrous. It concerns our allies as well as the rehabilitation of Russia. Russia is now in process of being cut into convenient pieces, absorbed and amalgamated into German Provinces. The Bolshevist government is an ally of Germany, so far as it has either vitality or organism. Its leaders, Lenine and Trotzky, it can be proven have been in constant communication with Germany both before and since their accession to power. I believe they are the puppets and willing instruments of Germany in molding Russian people and territory for German uses. Their government is a satire on the name.

It is a compound of slaughter, confiscation, anarchy, and universal disorder. It is the paradise of I. W. W.'s and the superlative heaven of anarchists and direct-action socialists. It has released a vast military force of the central powers to break in a savage deluge on the allies and Americans on the French border.

I believe the Bolshevist government is now endeavoring to obtain recognition from the United States. This insolent attempt is equal to the impudent assumption that what they represent is worthy of association with respectable governments. Yet this Senate had as well begin now to consider its course on that question as to discuss the question of a few dollars on salaries or effecting a few economies by reducing salaries. If we wish to clasp the hand that has smitten us and our allies in all probability the opportunity will come unless public opinion shall be so aroused as to kill the approach before it reaches diplomatic birth. This is a fit case for pitiless publicity. It is because of this that I desire to be heard on this before next Monday. The sooner this publicity comes, the more effective it is likely to be. The American people, not including direct-action socialists, pacifists, I. W. W. W.'s, and all that alien and traitorous ilk, if given an opportunity can express a public opinion of Bolshevists. It would be well, in that event, that the Senate is still an open forum. It at least can make some headway against the Creel Publicity Bureau and star-chamber suppression of public information bearing on questions that vitally concern many millions of young Americans and huge tax levies for some years to come.

Evidence accumulates constantly that German officers and soldiers taken prisoners by the preceding Russian Government are now the active instruments in organizing the military forces of the Bolshevist government. Those military forces are being thrust farther and farther toward Asiatic Russia. Germany already has possession of the Baltic Sea Provinces, and is rapidly absorbing the territory from East Prussia and the Gulf of Finland to the Arctic Ocean. The Ukraine is in process of becoming her dummy and vassal. Our enemy is about to reach vast supplies of breadstuffs, meats, oils, and metals. It is but a short step to the conscription of men in that vassal territory.

Siberia is a wheat field and cattle range of value, as well as a source of minerals. To-day evidence at hand indicates that many thousands of her captured soldiers are being organized into a military force to subjugate and hold that country. This is with the connivance or tacit consent of the Bolshevist government. This movement by Germany is a direct blow at one of our powerful allies, Japan. That nation can not act singly. If she moves her forces westward across Asia to meet this danger without our consent she risks entanglements where she must have a fast friend. She has a disciplined ready army reaching into millions. She has a powerful navy that can patrol Oriental waters from Vladivostok to the Mediterranean.

It is as well understood as any other diplomatic matter lacking official publicity that the United States opposes the entry of Japan into Asia. The American public opinion has been covertly inflamed against Japan by German influences. A systematic campaign accusing Japan of vast territorial ambition in Asia and the dismemberment of the Chinese Empire, or Republic, has been conducted both before and since 1914. The object of such a school of prejudice is evident. So long as Japan is inert Germany is left free to pursue her conquest and absorption of Russia. Here and there in the vast domain of that unhappy country there are struggles against German authority, ostensibly by Bolshevists. Such instances are widely isolated and sporadic in character. They serve as a convenient blind to mask the steady concentrated movement of Germany toward her goal. Great Britain and France both favor military action by Japan, not only to hold war supplies at Vladivostok and elsewhere but to check the development of German power and compel that Government to divide her forces now engaged in driving toward Paris and the Channel ports. Here, again, the American people face a case of watchful waiting. In this instance, however, it is not insurrectionary Mexico, it is an aggressive, resolute Germany. That Government knows precisely what it intends to do and it is doing it with unparalleled rapidity and decision.

We are watching at the front what is known as the Hindenburg drive, and while the public attention of the diplomatic corps is directed to that point as well, Germany is rapidly concentrating her forces in Russia and preparing to penetrate Asiatic Europe. Advices that do not come to me from diplomatic sources, it is true, nor yet from official sources, but from travelers returning from central Asia concerning the vast wheat fields and mineral country of Siberia, and from private citizens have come to me, and I regard such reports as authentic.

I have repeatedly heard those representing the administration refer to the struggle in which we are now engaged as a world war. It is. Therefore let our Government treat it as a world war and wage it by every effective method known to a civilized power. We must trust Japan, and, trusting her, ask her to attack the Government that menaces her by preparing a drive against her through Asia to the Pacific shore. Japan now waits for affirmative action by the American Government. That waiting is not by her voluntary act. It evidences great moral self-restraint when a powerful enemy is aggressively and constantly preparing a military movement that must end in serious injury to her to know that she waits on her allies before action and on the Senate for such action as it can take. The United States, represented by the present administration and by Congress, must take the responsibility for further delay.

Why does the administration hesitate? Irresolution and inaction are as dangerous in this crisis as the approaching columns of an invading army. Some time ago I deemed it proper to comment upon the character of certain of the President's official family.

I did it with this in view, and with it my comment this evening is a connected whole. I believe it to be justified if the character of his appointees who have access to the Executive ear have manifested sympathy with elements in our own country, who in turn are akin in sympathy, thought, and action with our enemies abroad. The labor unions of Mexico, for instance, are I. W. W. in their organization. Their constitution, rules, and practices are similar to the constitution and rules of that body in the United States. I have copies that are considered accurate from both countries, and they are similar in principle, and paragraph after paragraph is precisely similar in language. Not only are evils attendant upon unjust property holdings, both alien and domestic, sought to be destroyed, but the fair and just rights of property are assailed and confiscation is the usual course of affairs in that country. The development of Mexico industrially is at a standstill. Famine prevails in many Provinces. Domestic tranquillity is unstable. The moral influence of the United States has been exerted to support the present Carranza government, and properly so. I have no objection to that now. Without our recognition and constant help Carranza would have been unable to meet the opposition he found.

Leaving out of consideration the violation of the rights of American citizens in Mexico ever since it has been given over as a prey to disorder, adventurers, and bandits, it is prudent now to consider the conditions on our southern flank. German officials and military officers abound throughout that country to-day. Within a few miles of the United States border they are found in association with Carranza officials; they are banqueting at their tables; they are drinking toasts into the small hours of the morning, wishing success to both enterprises; they are instilling persistently hostility among Mexicans to the United States. Some time ago I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the cablegrams of felicitation exchanged between the Kaiser and the President of the Mexican Republic, the substance of which was that they wished each other long life and success in their governments. One, at least, is not compatible with a victorious peace by this country. The sources of large supplies of fuel oil are in Mexico. The presence of German authorities in that vicinity, as well as generally across the border, is a constant menace to us and our allies. The sympathetic bond between the turbulent element in Mexico and the I. W. W.'s, the pacifists, pro-Germans, and the like in our country, is not reassuring. I have what I consider reliable reports from men in the Southwest that there is a concerted sympathetic movement between the disturbing element in our own country and a like element in Mexico, acting in union with each other. June 1 was the date fixed for an insurrection. However, it did not occur, although it was expected confidently among the disorderly element and the banditti of Mexico.

Certain of the Mexican Provinces, such as Lower California, Sonora, and Sinaloa, are supposed to be the lurking place of Villa. Whatever be the actual truth, that territory is full of hostile sentiment towards this country. My information is that the turbulent element there is in constant communication with a similar element in our own country, planning domestic disorder. The I. W. W. and kindred spirits are definitely known to be in league with this effort.

In the trials now pending against Haywood and others in Chicago conclusive evidence is provided in correspondence addressed to Haywood and his associates to establish a concerted plot for a general uprising in this country. I believe a part of the Mexican plan is for a joint outbreak. I have no doubt but that the activity of Germans in Mexico is promoting this attack on our domestic peace. It is a part of their world scheme to disintegrate, weaken, and destroy their enemies. It succeeded in Russia. The German expects it to succeed in the United States. The American people are a different background before which to stage such proceedings. We have a conservative, law-abiding element. It is the great middle class which is the object of the bolshevist attack in Russia. The Lenine and Trotsky government appeals to the proletariat. I have heretofore defined this element in Russia by quotations from Trotzky's book known as "Our Revolution." It is practically government there by what is the I. W. W. in this country. The vagrant, the spendthrift, the disturber, the lawless, the criminal, the chronic idler, those who clamor for a divide, who believe all men are entitled to all things, that the world owes them a living whether they earn it or not; that the difficulties of collecting that living should be made the business of a Bolshevist government in this country, the direct-action socialist, the anarchist, the I. W. W., and in effect the parlor socialist, and, I am sorry to say, in many instances the single taxer, a number of whom the present administration persistently keeps in office; all believe and in their moments of reflection hope for such a government in the United States. That is their daydream, and they hope at some time it may come to pass.

Is it in a desire to pacify or conciliate this element that the explanation is to be found for the inexplicable inaction and destructive delay that characterizes the situation in the executive department of our Government? Neither, Mr. President, can this war be fought by nor can revenue be collected from the radical. Let the President trust the great, loyal middle group of Americans, who are neither theorists nor radicals. The effort to satisfy the radical will fail in both peace and war.

On January 9, 1918, the President's mediation commission reported to him on alleged labor conditions. Since their report, headed by Mr. Haywood, 112 I. W. W.'s have been placed on trial in the United States court in Chicago.

I have followed the evidence in that case; I have read with some detail the correspondence presented there, as well as the oral testimony given under the solemnity of an oath in that trial. In correspondence signed by various officials of that organization our soldiers are stigmatized as "murderers." I. W. W.'s are urged to resist the conscription act by "refusing to join bands of potential military murderers." Members are advised to hold their jobs with one hand and a Winchester in the other until they have fed themselves and starved their masters into submission. Factory fires totally destroying plants are referred to in such a way as to leave no doubt that I. W. W.'s are the responsible incendiaries. In the evidence adduced specific instances extend all the way from New York to Puget Sound. Nothing more comprehensive in destruction has been uncovered since the structural ironworkers' dynamite plot, headed by the McNamaras. Sabotage is a familiar weapon.

An employer is by their teachings their enemy at all times and places. The owner of property is but another name for an oppressor. Fruits and foods of all description are destroyed by the millions. Murder is justified if a property owner be the victim. They follow precisely the same practices and believe the same murderous creed of the bolshevist in Russia. Law is spurned, public officers despised, and government an object of contempt. The general tenor of their belief leads to a government, if such a travesty on the name is tolerated, as Russia's present condition and a large portion of Mexico. Deliberate murder, incendiary fires, both in fields, in great agricultural areas, and in industrial plants, with domestic disorder and immense destruction and delay in war preparations, as well as in civilian matters, are directly chargeable to the I. W. W.'s and their pro-German instigators. Minute directions, as shown by the documents and correspondence, on how to practice sabotage are given by their leaders. They are instructed to execute those instructions throughout the United States. If resistance is offered, they are to meet force by force, and the resulting taking of life is defined not to be murder but as the waging of industrial warfare against their enemies, the employer and the property owner.

The correspondence further shows a direct connection between these men on trial, the I. W. W.'s and men of their ilk in the United States, and the bolshevist government in Russia. An exchange of literature is found to have been made, and unity of action is to be developed in both countries.

Incidentally Mooney's conviction in California engages their attention. That is what they meant when then stated that its effect was to be felt far beyond the confines of California. Agitation around the world is to obtain his release. The executions of their members, tried and convicted under the laws of several States for atrocious murders, are denounced as crimes of capitalism against the poor. The war is described as a struggle of the rich to rivet economic chains on the working class everywhere.

There is not any such thing, Mr. President, as a working class in this country. We all work; everybody but the idler and the vagrant works in some way, either by his hands or his head or a mixture of both mind and muscle. The idea that there can be no class created here is foreign to the truth and to the genius of the American Government. Conscription is to be resisted accordingly, because it is only a means of riveting the rights of the property owner upon the neck of the nonproperty owner. They anticipate world-wide power. They point to Russia as an initial success of their beliefs. Letters antedating by only a few weeks the Russian Revolution sought information from Haywood and others on the progress being made in America to take property from those who now own it and bring about industrial freedom by confiscating it and vesting it in these idle organized vagrants of the Republic. The connection between Russia and the United States through this lawless brood is similar to the relation between the like element in Mexico and this country.

In view of the foregoing developments the mediation commission's report on the I. W. W. is illuminating. In the Arizona disorder the I. W. W. is minimized and dismissed as a trivial factor. The commission refers to "shocking dislocations of a basic war industry." Behind and controlling, however, the factor which immediately led to the strike are, it is said, the underlying labor conditions of the mining industry of the State, which were devoid of safeguards against strikes and, in fact, provocative of them. Distant ownership in Arizona is given as a contributing cause, as if no man who lived out of the community had a right to own anything in the community. Migratory labor, it is said, has helped to spread ideas of liberalism into our industrial life. Racial conditions, alien languages, unmarried men, a feeling of injustice—all are cited to explain the transient character of the time occupied in work by the drifting laborer. The remedy is promptly recommended as the trade-union, because of its unifying spirit. It is further found in the commission's report that the heavy profits in Arizona of the copper companies has provoked the opinion that the war is capitalistic. The I. W. W. does not, the report says, account for the disorder. This is found in industrial wrongs. The foregoing relates to the Arizona copper fields.

The Pacific Northwest conditions are analyzed. It is found that unhealthy social conditions explain the unrest there. Hardships in the camps are presented. Physical comforts and certain spiritual satisfaction are demanded. A healthy social environment is lacking, resulting in migratory, drifting workers. The camps have not been made communities. In such places the I. W. W. membership averages high. It will be admitted that many lumber camps are temporary. The nature of the occupation makes the accommodations rough. Violence is readily resorted to. In view of these conditions it is singular the commission's report minimizes the I. W. W. and dismisses them with but little claim to a disturbing cause of the widespread trouble. The commission's report says "according to the estimates of conservative students of the phenomena a very small percentage of the I. W. W. are really understanding followers of subversive doctrines. The I. W. W. is seeking results by dramatizing evils and by romantic promises of relief." The I. W. W. is further excused by finding that it "has exercised its strongest hold in those industries and communities where employers have most resisted the trade-union movement." This translated into commonplace language, means wherever the employer has refused to convert his establishment into a closed shop it has bred I. W. W.'s with their resulting sabotage and destruction. The argument therefore is that you must accept the closed shop or the I. W. W.—and you may take your choice. When it is reflected that this report is made by those holding official positions it can be understood how far such representatives of the Government have departed from their sovereign duty to speak for all and not for a mere group of the American people.

Not content with these partisan reflections, the report continues "too often there is a glaring inconsistency between our democratic purposes in this war abroad and the autocratic conduct of some of those guiding industry at home," referring to the Bisbee deportation. The commission further adventures into revenue matters as well as expenditures, and advises that "so long as profiteering is not comprehensively prevented to the full extent that governmental action can prevent it, just so long will a sense of inequality disturb the fullest devotion of labor's contribution to the war." It is recommended that profiteering be prohibited in order to satisfy the workmen; that all industries be unionized as an accepted part of the labor policy of the Nation. When it is fully realized that Federal officers are attempting to force upon, not only employers, but everybody, the closed shop and compel membership in unions, the extent to which the commission has perverted its powers and abused its authority can be understood.

Mr. President, I have a news clipping, a cablegram from a soldier in France, a former sheriff in Cochise County, Ariz. He is one of those indicted for deporting the I. W. W.'s from Bisbee and other points. He acknowledges his responsibility, and says that when he can return from the service he desires to be placed upon trial for the alleged offense. These men who deported and stopped the eruption of this lawless element acted even more wisely than they knew. They prevented the destruction and disorder that was plotted for that part of the United States. They prevented the perpetration of the same offenses for which those 112 defendants in Chicago are on trial to-day. It is worthy of remark here that I. W. W.'s are on trial in Chicago, and those who protected the communities from that disorderly clan in the Southwest are themselves indicted for doing what the Government failed to do but ought to have done.

I have no criticism to make against a closed shop. That is a matter of choice and collective bargaining. I have been the subject of some denunciation in resolutions of labor unions. I am content to be their object of attack if I can restore their membership to an appreciation of the civil rights of an American citizen. They must understand that at last institutional liberty in free governments can not rest upon the arbitrary acts which many of them insist upon substituting for the law of the land. Unions can not become the Government nor can antiunion sentiment rule. Both comprise American citizens and both must be given the equal protection of law. I have supported many acts to protect the right of a union to exist and of a workman to be a member of a union without discrimination. I repeat what I have said many times. I have no hostility to unions. I will as consistently support their right as I will those whom they attack and sometimes seek to destroy. When, however, Government authorities undertake to promote and thrust upon everybody the rule of the union, I protest against such an administration of governmental power. The union like other useful organizations must appeal to the voluntary action of those whom it would bring within its membership or influence. It is utterly repugnant to the elemental principles of free government that public officers shall force the union upon everybody, willing or unwilling.

Back of the dangerous character of the Mediation Commission's report on this subject is the covert but poorly concealed suggestion that the I. W. W. is suffering from unbearable wrongs which make him uncontrollable in his impulses and free from responsibility when faced with the criminality of his widespread lawlessness. Not long ago a certain magazine which hails itself as an economic progressive advised the Government to go slow in prosecuting I. W. W.'s. The answer of the Senate to that suggestion was the passage of the bill of the Senator from Montana, which is now awaiting action in the House, slumbering in a committee—it ought to be the law of this country—by which the Government would be given adequate power to deal properly with this seditious element wherever found.

The magazine article to which I have referred adopted the tone of the Mediation Commission's report. Instead of prosecuting them for obstructing enlistments and opposing the war they were to be counseled with and asked to state their purposes. Instead of holding an incendiary responsible for his arson he is to be requested to come before a commission and state why he resorts to the torch instead of law-abiding methods to better condition. A murderous fiend who avows the right, the justice of his violence, is not to be prosecuted but called on to state his grievances which induced him to take the life of his fellow man.

To put it in more palpable and generalized statement the claim is both in the Mediation Commission's report and the editorial in the magazine named that an I. W. W. is an irresponsible instrument propelled by ungovernable economic forces to commit the outrages mentioned as the fit and proper method to redress his grievances. Instead of punishing him for crime the Government must remove the conditions which compelled him to commit crime. Those conditions the I. W. W. will tell you if you own property is to give it to him. After he shall have consumed it or made it useless, being a migratory worker, he will vanish from the scene until your industry and thrift has collected further supplies for him to take. It is the universal sentiment of this school that all men are alike if you pay them alike. The difference between a tramp and an industrious farmer, or any other employer who has enough to become responsible, is merely the possession of property. If it were all taken away from private owners, or an equal divide made, there would be no tramp, no I. W. W.'s, no millionaires, and no crime. The same thing is to be accomplished by universal Government ownership of all instruments of production, distribution, and all other means contributing to present private undertakings. There is no difference in effect between the socialistic state and the happy condition of the I. W. W. if permitted to control. The difference is purely theoretical. Socialism would likely be a concentrated tyranny in the hands of a few determined men while the I. W. W. government would be universal disorder out of which would emerge the rule of the cave man. Both travel to the same destination. Both are retrogressive and utterly destructive of the fruits of civilized effort.

This chronic pervert of journalism frankly appeals to an American bolshevist movement. It manifests its chronic hatred, with the I. W. W.'s, of any self-supporting man or woman who can save anything and thereby become a property owner. It hails with satisfaction every I. W. W. disturbance as proof of the necessity of a socialistic state. At heart it is an apostle of socialistic violence. It is a pacifist clothed in war colors for prudential reasons. It enjoys postal privileges only because it supports the administration's tendency toward universal Government ownership. It is willing to take the present tendency as a basis of an executed hope in the due course of economic progress toward a general divide.

This element in our country previous to the war have denounced existing laws in the most scurrilous terms. Civil society has been criticized in language of derision and contempt. The marriage relation and that of parent and child exposed in words of ribaldry and obscenity unfit to mar the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. All such distinguished gentry, however, are by the Mediation Commission analyzed as mere victims of conditions which relieved them from moral wrong. The inference is that indictment and punishment of such unmitigated pests for the wholesale crimes they have committed systematically across the continent is official persecution. The remedy is for such social philosophers as the members of that commission to devise a sytem which shall enable the I. W. W. to be satisfied and to take from those who have and earn and vest in those who neither have and seldom earn. It is this insidious but fatal spirit which hovers about and threatens the head of this administration. It is in this poisonous influence I find the deadly hesitation and destructive delays in dealing promptly with the situation in Russia. It explains why the United States Government holds Japan back from defending herself against the enemy gathering his power for a vast assault across Asia to the Pacific shore.

The United States is the fittest power to deal with this question in its relation to Russia. France is probably considered by the Russian who thinks on such matters as having been sympathetic with the Czar's government. Great Britain is under a similar impression. What led to treaties or secret diplomatic understandings with the Czar's government is not inconsistent with the future welfare of Russia. English diplomats met everywhere in Europe and Asia the machinations of Germany. Like the United States, much of England's population were strangly blind to the Kaiser's purpose of universal empire. England's statesmen who foresaw the danger had this oblivion and the deadly pacifist to deal with at home.

Both Great Britain and France entered into such arrangements with the then Government of Russia as were calculated to join Russian power with them to resist German encroachments. Added to this known condition is a very heavy indebtedness, held in France and some in England, against the Russian Government. The Bolshevist becomes frantic at the mere mention of paying a debt, whether it be public or private. A creditor deserves death equally with the property owner; and in Finland, another of the Bolshevist provinces, they have recently imposed that as the penalty for being creditors. Literally, vessels filled with the blood of bankers have been shed in some of the Bolshevist provinces. That is their practical way of canceling debts.

Great Britain and France have both consented to Japan's intervention in Asiatic affairs. They, however, are not, for obvious reasons, in the good graces of the Bolshevist. The fact that the United States has so far declined to consent to Japan's protection of her country against the coming danger is considered by the Bolshevistic government as an admitted proof of sympathy and ultimate recognition. It is here the borderland of danger is reached. It will be entered upon the day we are asked to recognize the present medley of ruin which claims to control the Russian Empire. Within 48 hours we are liable to have sent to the Senate the notification of the demand for confirmation and recognition of an ambassador from the Bolshevist government, which will involve the question of recognizing it among the family of nations and in some measure limit us in dealing with it as well as our allies.

To us it is of vital concern that we act and act now. The initial decision is to request Japan to use her entire military and naval strength to crush the German conspiracy which, either by tacit consent or secret plot, is now enlarging its domain so it can sustain aggressive war for an indefinite period. This country is more favorably situated to give the deciding influence than any other in the world. If we do not allow the radical Bolshevist element in this Republic to taint the executive mind, we can strike Germany a fatal blow at a decisive moment. This is no time for watchful waiting on this vital subject. Such an obsession can never be forgiven, because it means weary years of destructive and world-wide war. Nothing matters now but the defeat of Germany. The embattled nations of the earth are met upon a vast military front. Scarcely a neutral of consequence remains. The elemental forces of nations face each other in a final struggle. Either free government and permanent peace or absolutism and the reign of armed legions forever will be hereafter the lot of mankind. The issue is joined. The struggle is irrepressible. This Republic must now realize that the two antagonistic sympathies can not survive. The world has ceased to be politically and geographically large enough for each to remain. Kings may survive the conflict. They will, however, be executive, subject to the rule of law and not arbitrary rulers over the lives and welfare of helpless subjects. So, what matters it with lesser affairs if we conquer the one great enemy? With Germany overthrown, negotiations can settle all subsidiary questions.

What matters it if we reduce or increase salaries here by a few million dollars, if we can accomplish the paramount purpose of crushing the public enemy?

Nations will be sated with blood. A surfeit of war will have turned the hearts of men toward the basis of a permanent peace. The domestic problems, the economic questions and beliefs, however radical, however reactionary, however wise, may be relegated to the civil authorities and the parliaments of a free people. This collossal danger must not be confused or aggravated by seeking to use it to promote favorite reform, however ardently hoped for by their disciples. Now is the time effectively to see clear-eyed and with a unity of purpose. With a fighting line that girts the earth, it is the duty of our country to utilize to the fullest limit every instrument against Germany. Every power, every people, every commercial resource, every treaty or understanding that will strengthen the arm and direct the blow upon the warlike head of our enemy is to be utilized now, not next year, but now while the enemy is delivering what he hopes to be an effective blow against us.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator think he is justified in the assumption that Japan desires at the present time to intervene in Siberia, and that she is restrained because the United States has not expressed approval?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think I am.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator is very much mistaken.

Mr. SHERMAN. Events will determine whether I am mistaken or not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator is very much mistaken, and that Japan is no more anxious to take a step of that sort than the other nations, including the United States, are if it were desirable.

Mr. SHERMAN. Whether she is anxious or not, I will not undertake to say; but that she is willing to intervene in Siberia and upon the Pacific shores to protect herself against a potential enemy that will be within striking distance I believe I am justified in saying is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think it is a great mistake for the Senator here, in his capacity as a Member of the United States Senate, to give out the impression that he knows that Japan desires now to intervene in Russia.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have stated that she is willing to intervene as her part in this war, as an ally of the United States. I believe she is willing if she has the consent of our Government to do so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I feel very sure that the Senator is mistaken, and I have some reason for expressing that belief.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am very glad to have the Senator express his belief on that question. I have expressed mine. Future events will determine who is right. I have some information that satisfies me that I ought to say what I am now saying this afternoon on the floor of this Chamber.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. I feel sure that the Senator from Nebraska has more accurately stated the Japanese-Siberian situation as it existed a short time ago than the distinguished Senator from Illinois. I feel that I am not betraying any confidence when I say that I have every reason to believe that a few weeks ago there was no general demand in Japan that a military expedition be sent to Siberia unless it was imperatively required for the preservation of her rights and interests and the interests of her allies, and that Japan was not then convinced that a military expedition, either by herself or in connection with her allies, would be of any advantage. My opinion upon this matter was formed after some investigation of the matter and after getting some information from what might be called official sources. I believe, however, that since then the changed and changing conditions have altered somewhat Japan's attitude and led to a feeling upon the part of various elements in Japan that there should be intervention—allied intervention, let me say—in Siberia, at least.

I have no doubt but what many officials of the Japanese Government feel that Germany is a real menace to Japan. As to how extensive or universal the feeling is in Japan for Japanese intervention in Siberia I can not with any degree of certainty or accuracy state.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I can not turn aside, in the time within which I desire to conclude, to discuss the question of whether Japan has hesitated to express any desire to intervene, because up to this time certain conditions upon that intervention in continental Asia have been sought to be imposed upon her with reference to territory after the war shall have ended. Because of those conditions, Japan has not indicated that with the conditions annexed she is willing to make the sacrifice. I think the whole truth will be found to be that if Japan had the expression given her by the United States, that I understand the European allied powers have given her without conditions annexed, she would enter upon a defensive war for her Asiatic flank and let the conditions be determined by negotiations after the war shall have been won. I am so strongly convinced of the truth of this condition that I have been moved to make this assertion this afternoon. I am neither dogmatic nor infallible. I may be incorrect. I am stating what I learned, not from official sources, with which I am not favored, but from what I consider correct outside unofficial sources, including, as I stated, men who have returned from Siberia very recently and who have journeyed all the way from the wheat fields of the Caspian Sea and Black Sea region to Vladivostok in their travels, including very minute observations on the way. Even if I am in error, it will do less injury by far than if I am right and unheeded.

We must not wait until Paris shall be besieged at close quarters, until the Channel ports shall have fallen into the hands of the enemy. Neither must we wait until Russia shall have been absorbed and assimilated by German power, her vast population conscripted, Province by Province, and turned by German drill sergeants to fight us wherever our troops are found. This can be met not by watchful waiting, but by decisive instant action. The longer it is delayed the more it will cost us of the young blood now assembling in the vast camps of our country. The more we must levy by future revenue bills and draw from the people in future loans.

Public sentiment supports the conscription act. It subscribes for liberty bonds. It will give of its men and of its money without stint to the end of this struggle and with strictly nonpartisan action.

There has been no partisan division in this Chamber, nor will there be, upon the vital question of meeting and conquering the public enemy. In return for it, without regard to political divisions, it will demand and it will have the pitiless publicity so beloved by the Executive in former years, at least. Secret policies promoting economic changes, however necessary in the opinion of some elements, must not be permitted to obscure our primal duty to our Nation or the nations who are giving their all in this war. However wise super and extra official ambassadors may be, and however useless mere official pigmies elected by qualified voters may seem to those irresponsible rulers of diplomatic communications, this is still a government through the established forms of constitutional power and limitation of the American people. If those who have become mad by excessive learning or thinking too precisely along a narrow channel of thought, or upon some event, shall attempt to mold our diplomacy or control our warlike action by attempting to promote either at home or abroad certain economic obsessions it will at least be a crime not only against our people but against the free governments of the world. The supreme purpose to be served now is not the promotion of a general divide or leveling of possessions or condition either in Russia, Mexico, or the United States. It is to break the military power once and for all of Germany. If the war powers of this Republic be deflected or used for any other purpose it is an abuse and a perversion of government generously trusted by nonpartisan action in the hands of the Commander in Chief, with no thought of domestic or economic questions in the future. The latter are incidental and can be met by the future civilian after the great military peril shall have been abated. The primary question here is to use all of the instrumentalities at home and abroad to conquer the public enemy, and then refer, in time of peace, the civilian questions to civilians.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the committee, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The first amendment was, on page 2, line 9, before the word "supervising," to strike out "ten" and insert "eleven"; in line 17, before the words "a year," to strike out "$3,600" and insert "$3,450"; on page 3, line 9, after the word "Florida," to insert "Tampa, Florida"; in line 25, before the words "per year," to strike out "$3,100" and insert "$2,900"; on page 4, line 5, before the words "per year," to strike out "$2,850" and insert "$2,700"; in line 12, before the words "per year," to strike out "$2,600" and insert "$2,500"; in line 16, before the words "per year," to strike out "$2,400" and insert "$2,350"; in line 24, after the word "Florida," to insert "Tampa, Florida"; on page 5, line 2, before the words "per year," to strike out "$2,250" and insert "$2,100"; in line 6, before the words "a year," to strike out "$2,600" and insert "$2,500"; in line 10 before the words "per year," to strike out "$2,400" and insert "$2,350"; in line 11, before the words "a year," to strike out "$2,200" and insert "$2,100"; and at the top of page 6, to insert:

The Secretary of Commerce may appoint not exceeding four traveling inspectors when in his judgment they are necessary for the improvement of the service, each of whom shall be entitled to a salary of $3,000 a year and his actual necessary traveling expenses while traveling on official business.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 4402, 4404, and 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and they are hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4402. That there shall be a supervising inspector general, who shall be appointed from time to time by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall be selected with reference to his fitness and ability to systematize and carry into effect all the provisions of law relating to the Steamboat-Inspection Service, and who shall be entitled to a salary of $5,000 a year and his actual necessary traveling expenses while traveling on official business assigned him by competent authority, together with his actual and reasonable expenses for transportation of instruments, which shall be certified and sworn to under such instructions as shall be given by the Secretary of Commerce.

"SEC. 4404. There shall be 11 supervising inspectors, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Each of them shall be selected for his knowledge, skill, and practical experience in the uses of steam for navigation, and shall be a competent judge of the character and qualities of steam vessels and of all parts of the machinery employed in steaming. Each supervising inspector shall be entitled to a salary of $3,450 a year and his actual necessary traveling expenses while traveling on official business assigned him by competent authority, together with his actual and reasonable expenses for transportation of instruments, which shall be certified and sworn to under such instructions as shall be given by the Secretary of Commerce.

"SEC. 4414. There shall be in each of the following collection districts, namely, the districts of Philadelphia, Pa.; San Francisco, Cal.; New London, Conn.; Baltimore, Md.; Detroit, Mich.; Chicago, Ill.; Bangor, Me.; New Haven, Conn.; Michigan, Mich.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Willamette, Oreg.; Puget Sound, Wash.; Savannah, Ga.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Oswego, N. Y.; Charleston, S. C.; Duluth, Minn.; Superior, Mich.; Apalachicola, Fla.; Galveston, Tex.; Mobile, Ala.; Providence, R. I.; and in each of the following ports: New York, N. Y.; Jacksonville, Fla.; Tampa, Fla.; Portland, Me., Boston, Mass.; Buffalo, N. Y.; Cleveland, Ohio; Toledo, Ohio; Norfolk, Va.; Evansville, Ind.; Dubuque, Iowa; Louisville, Ky.; Albany, N. Y.; Cincinnati, Ohio; Memphis, Tenn.; Nashville, Tenn.; St. Louis, Mo.; Port Huron, Mich.; New Orleans, La.; Los Angeles, Cal.; Juneau, Alaska; St. Michaels, Alaska; Point Pleasant, W. Va.; and Burlington, Vt.; Honolulu, Hawaii; and San Juan, P. R.; one inspector of hulls and one inspector of boilers.

"The inspector of hulls and the inspector of boilers in the districts and ports enumerated in the preceding paragraphs shall be entitled to the following salaries, to be paid under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, namely:

"For the port of New York, N. Y., at the rate of $2,900 per year for each local inspector.

"For the districts of Philadelphia, Pa.; Baltimore, Md.; San Francisco, Cal.; and Puget Sound, Wash.; and the ports of Boston, Mass.; Buffalo, N. Y.; and New Orleans, La., at the rate of $2,700 per year for each local inspector.

"For the districts of Michigan, Mich.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Duluth, Minn.; Providence, R. I.; Chicago, Ill.; and the ports of Albany, N. Y.; Cleveland, Ohio; Portland, Me.; Los Angeles, Cal.; Juneau, Alaska; St. Michael, Alaska; and Norfolk, Va.; Honolulu, Hawaii; and San Juan, P. R., at the rate of $2,500 per year for each local inspector.

"For the districts of Oswego, N. Y.; Willamette, Oreg.; Detroit, Mich.; and Mobile, Ala.; and the Ports of St. Louis, Mo.; and Port Huron, Mich., at the rate of $2,350 per year for each local inspector.

"For the districts of Pittsburgh, Pa.; New Haven, Conn.; Savannah, Ga.; Charleston, S. C.; Galveston, Tex.; New London, Conn.; Superior, Mich.; Bangor, Me.; and Apalachicola, Fla.; and the ports of Dubuque, Iowa; Toledo, Ohio; Evansville, Ind.; Memphis, Tenn.; Nashville, Tenn.; Point Pleasant, W. Va.; Burlington, Vt.; Jacksonville, Fla.; Tampa, Fla.; Louisville, Ky.; and Cincinnati, Ohio, at the rate of $2,100 per year for each local inspector.

"And in addition the Secretary of Commerce may appoint, in districts or ports where the volume of work requires them, assistant inspectors, at a salary, for the port of New York, of $2,500 a year each; for the port of New Orleans, La.; the districts of Philadelphia, Pa.; Baltimore, Md.; the ports of Boston, Mass.; Chicago, Ill.; and the district of San Francisco, Cal., at $2,350 per year each; and for all other districts and ports at a salary of $2,100 a year each; and he may appoint a clerk to any such board at a compensation not exceeding $1,500 a year to each person so appointed. Every inspector provided for in this or the preceding sections of this title shall be paid his actual necessary traveling expenses while traveling on official business assigned him by competent authority, together with his actual and reasonable expenses for transportation of instruments, which shall be certified and sworn to under such instructions as shall be given by the Secretary of Commerce.

"Assistant inspectors, appointed as provided by law, shall perform such duties of actual inspection as may be assigned to them under the direction, supervision, and control of the local inspectors.

"The Secretary of Commerce may appoint not exceeding four traveling inspectors when in his judgment they are necessary for the improvement of the service, each of whom shall be entitled to a salary of $3,000 a year and his actual necessary traveling expenses while traveling on official business.

"And the Secretary of Commerce may from time to time detail said assistant inspectors of one port or district for service in any other port or district, as the needs of the Steamboat-Inspection Service may, in his discretion, require, and the actual necessary traveling expenses of assistant inspectors so detailed, while traveling on official business assigned them by competent authority, shall, subject to such limitations as the said Secretary may in his discretion prescribe, be paid in the same manner as provided in this section for inspectors."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. RANSDELL. I ask the Senate to take up for consideration the conference report on the river and harbor appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10069) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I will state that there are one or two matters upon which the conferees have not been able to agree, and my official information is such that I believe that this report should be rejected and the whole matter sent back to conference. I should be pleased to have a negative vote on the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was rejected.

Mr. RANSDELL. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments and request a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. RANSDELL, and Mr. NELSON managers at the further conference on the part of the Senate.

CONDEMNATION OF LANDS FOR MILITARY PURPOSES.

Mr. KING. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4687. It will take but a few moments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4687) to amend further an act entitled "An act to authorize condemnation proceedings of lands for military purposes," approved July 2, 1917, as amended, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That during the pendency of the present war, any person, association, or corporation, for the purpose of furnishing electric power to the United States or to persons, associations, or corporations engaged in the manufacture of ships, explosives, or munitions of war, or other articles and things for the use of the United States or its allies, upon compliance with the conditions hereinafter set forth, may institute proceedings in any district court of the United States or in any court of any State having jurisdiction of the property to be condemned, for the acquirement or condemnation of any land, the temporary use thereof, or other interest therein, or right pertaining thereto, required for the location or construction of any power plant, or for the transmission of electric power for the operation of any plants which are or may be employed in the production of the articles and things hereinbefore mentioned. That proceedings for the condemnation of property required for the generation and transmission of such electric power shall be prosecuted in accordance with the procedure prescribed for the condemnation of property in the State wherein the proceedings may be instituted.

SEC. 2. That before any person, association, or corporation, furnishing or to furnish electric power for the purposes mentioned in section 1 of this act, shall have the right to institute proceedings for condemnation, they shall submit to the Secretary of War a full and complete statement of the plan for furnishing power and the nature and extent of the easements or property which they desire to acquire under condemnation proceedings, for the purposes stated in the preceding section. If the Secretary of War approve such plan and finds that the construction or extension of such facilities for the generation or transmission of power is necessary to increase the supply of power for the objects and purposes stated in section 1 of this act, then such person, association, or corporation shall upon the approval of such plan by the Secretary of War, have the right to construct, maintain, and operate the facilities described in such plan, and may cause proceedings to be instituted in any court having jurisdiction thereof for the acquirement by condemnation of any lands, the temporary use thereof, or other interest therein, or right pertaining thereto, including such land or other property previously devoted to public use, as may be needed for the construction, maintenance, and operation of such facilities: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed as authorizing any rights in any waters of the United States except such as may be necessary to build such transmission lines along or across said waters as may be approved by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That the Secretary of War may, prior to granting his approval as above set forth, require such person, association, or corporation to file with him a bond, in an amount and with a surety or sureties satisfactory to him, conditioned upon the prompt construction of the proposed facilities and the diligent maintenance and operation of the same to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War during the present war.

SEC. 3. That any person, association, or corporation having secured the approval of the Secretary of War and filed a petition for condemnation as herein provided may, upon filing with the court in which such petition is filed a bond to secure payment of just compensation to the owners of property taken, in a form and an amount and with a surety or sureties approved by said court after such notice and such hearing as the court may prescribe, have the right of immediate possession and use of such property or rights.

SEC. 4. That no plan for the construction or extension of any facilities shall be submitted to or approved by the Secretary of War hereunder after the existing state of war between the United States and its enemies shall have terminated, and the fact of such termination shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President, but such termination of the existing state of war so ascertained and proclaimed shall not interfere with the condemnation of any land or other property or rights needed for the construction, maintenance, and operation of any facilities approved hereunder by the Secretary of War before such proclamation: Provided, however, That the Secretary of War may upon such termination of the existing state of war and prior to the entry of judgment in any condemnation proceeding hereunder and the commencement of construction or extension of the proposed facilities revoke any approval given hereunder to the plan for such proposed facilities: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed as granting the right to operate such facilities after the termination of the existing state of war.

Mr. KING. I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out, on page 7, lines 15 and 16, the following words, if the Senator from Wisconsin will follow me:

Including such land or other property previously devoted to public use,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah proposes an amendment to the committee amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, on page 7, lines 15 and 16, it is proposed to strike out the words "including such land or other property previously devoted to public use."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer an amendment to the committee amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "mentioned," in line 16, page 6, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That the right acquired by the condemnation herein authorized shall terminate when the power furnished ceases to be used in production for the United States or for the allies of this country in the present war.

Mr. KING. In behalf of the committee I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 7, after the word "power," where it occurs the first time, it is proposed to insert "and that the condemnation herein authorized."

Mr. KING. I accept that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 19, after the word "rights," it is proposed to insert "in any public lands of the United States or."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I have been very much interested in the discussion of this bill and I understand it very fully. [Laughter.] I presume that the rights of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] with reference to Niagara Falls have been properly preserved.

Mr. KING. I can assure the distinguished Senator that they are fully protected.

Mr. FALL. With that assurance, I shall make no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the engrossment of the amendment and the third reading of the bill.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize condemnation of lands for the generation and transmission of electric power."

VALIDATION OF HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

Mr. POMERENE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator withhold that motion for a minute? I wish to call up a bill from the calendar.

Mr. POMERENE. It is important to have an executive session.

Mr. MYERS. I shall then desire an executive session. It will take but a minute.

Mr. POMERENE. If it leads to any discussion I must insist on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield, provided the bill leads to no discussion.

Mr. MYERS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 947) validating certain homestead entries.

Mr. CURTIS. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all pending homestead entries made in good faith prior to January 1, 1916, under the provisions of the enlarged homestead laws, and all rights to enter land under said laws, based on settlement made thereon in good faith before said date, and while the land was unsurveyed, by persons who, before making such enlarged homestead entry, had acquired title to land under the homestead laws, and therefore were not qualified to make an enlarged homestead entry, or such settlement, be, and the same are hereby, validated, if in all other respects regular, in all cases where the original homestead entry was for less than 160 acres of land: Provided, That no settlement claim shall be validated hereby where adverse claim for the land has been initiated before the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That no homestead entry heretofore made under the provisions of section 2 of the act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of the Colorado Cooperative Colony, to permit homestead entries in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved June 5, 1900, shall be canceled for the reason that the former entry made by the entryman was commuted under the provisions of an act entitled "An act relating to the public lands of the United States," approved June 15, 1880 (21 Stat., 237). And all entries heretofore canceled on the ground that an entryman who commuted under the provisions of said act of June 15, 1880, is not entitled to the benefits of the act of June 5, 1900, shall be reinstated upon a showing by the entryman or his heirs, within one year from the approval of this act, that there were no valid grounds for the cancellation of such entries except that a former entry was perfected under the act of June 15, 1880, in all cases where valid adverse rights have not attached to the lands covered by such second entries since the date of their cancellation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana to proceed to the consideration of the bill just read.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. I offer an amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 2, strike out the word "sixty" and insert the word "twenty" before "acres," so as to read:

In all cases where the original homestead entry was for less than 120 acres of land.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I had not seen or read this bill before, but I should like to know from the Senator from Wisconsin his reason for offering the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. The only effect of the amendment is that it will not give the right of validation to one who has had a former entry in excess of 120 acres, the reason being that if one was entitled to enter 160 acres and had entered 159 acres he ought not by virtue of merely lacking 1 acre of the amount he was entitled to have the right of an additional entry for 320 acres.

Mr. STERLING. I simply want to say that the illustration given by the Senator from Wisconsin I do not think is very pertinent. The way public lands are taken is in quarter sections of 160 acres or subdivisions thereof. It will be 160 or 120 or 80 acres, as the case may be. It seems to me that where the original entry was less than 160 acres there ought to be a validation of the entry.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator think if an entryman has 159 acres of the best land in the United States the mere fact that he did not get 1 more acre should entitle him to an additional entry of 320 acres?

Mr. STERLING. No; I do not think that; but I think if he has 1 acre in excess of 120 acres there ought to be a validation of the subsequent entry.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. I also offer the following amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, at the end of line 5, insert the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That the acreage of any entry so validated shall be reduced by the number of acres comprised in the former entry of the claimant. In making such reduction the entryman shall be permitted to designate in a compact form the portion to be excluded from his entry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL GERMAN-AMERICAN ALLIANCE.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Before the Senator makes his motion, will he yield to me?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I wish to give notice that on Monday I shall ask the Senate to take up for consideration the resolution for the revocation of the charter of the National German-American Alliance.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. POMERENE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, June 24, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate June 20, 1918.

RECEIVER OF PUBLIC MONEYS.

Adelbert B. Gray to be receiver of public moneys at Carson City, Nev.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 20, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Come Thou Almighty God, Heavenly Father, and possess our minds and hearts; quicken all that is purest, noblest, best in us, that we may do the work Thou hast given us to do, with clear conceptions, pure hearts, and willing hands; to the glory and honor of Thy holy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LONERGAN for two days, to attend the funeral of a former Member of Congress.

ALIEN SLACKERS.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a memorandum which I left with the President some days ago in regard to alien slackers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 12000) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 4597) extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near the city of Fairmont, W. Va., in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3524. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to extend temporarily the time for filing applications and fees and taking action in the United States Patent Office in favor of nations granting reciprocal rights to United States citizens," approved August 17, 1916; and

S. J. Res. 157. Joint resolution admitting into the United States 1,000 cases of chartreuse ordered by Batjer & Co., of New York, before the passage of the food-control act prohibiting the importation of distilled spirits, the delivery of which was delayed on account of war conditions until after that act went into effect.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 70. Joint resolution authorizing the erection on the public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a statue of James Buchanan, a former President of the United States.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 4597. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near the city of Fairmont, W. Va.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 3524. An act to amend the act entitled "An act to extend temporarily the time for filing applications and fees and taking action in the United States Patent Office in favor of nations granting reciprocal rights to United States citizens," approved August 17, 1916; to the Committee on Patents.

S. J. Res. 157. Joint resolution admitting into the United States 1,000 cases of chartreuse ordered by Batjer & Co., of New York, before the passage of the food-control act prohibiting the importation of distilled spirits, the delivery of which was delayed on account of war conditions until after that act went into effect; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 11185. An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 4482. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended.

AMENDMENT TO WAR-RISK INSURANCE ACT—CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that House bill 12512 may be transferred from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Reserving the right to object, I want to make a parliamentary inquiry. On June 7 the House agreed to have a transfer——

The SPEAKER. Has that anything to do with this request?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It has not anything to do with it except that it has to do with rereferring bill from one committee to the other.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am asking unanimous consent.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman can go ahead with his request for unanimous consent, and I can ask my question afterwards.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman's parliamentary inquiry about this bill?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Not this particular bill.

The SPEAKER. We do not want to mix up the two. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to refer House bill 12512 to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman indicate the title of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 12512) to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department,' approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917.

The SPEAKER. Why does the gentleman want to rerefer this bill?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, personally I do not care anything about it. I have made the request only in the interest of orderly procedure and because this bill belongs to the Committee on Military Affairs. A very peculiar situation arose. While the war-risk insurance bill was under consideration it became necessary to increase the rank of generals, and the simplest and easiest way apparently was for the Senate to put an amendment on the war-risk insurance bill which did that. The House conferees agreed to it. They probably agreed to more than they expected to agree to at that time. Ordinarily in both House and Senate this matter would go to the Military Affairs Committee. The amendment that is proposed in the bill introduced by the gentleman from Missouri deals wholly with the question of rank and pay of men in the Army. It does not deal with the question of insurance. It just happened to be attached here by accident. It ought to go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the thing now. It never ought to have been on that bill to start with, but it was put on; so in referring the bill, inasmuch as it amended that act, it looked as though it ought to go to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It was entirely correct to refer it to that committee under the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The original amendment never ought to have been put on the war-risk bill, but it was done, and can not be undone now, and this is probably as good a thing as could be done. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PENSIONS.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on an omnibus pension bill, H. R. 7634, which is on the Speaker's table, and I move that the House agree to the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 7634) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 655).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. The requests for the exemption of the 46 clerical employees were made in December, 1917, at which time, during the great expansion then taking place, it was imperative that the working force should not be disrupted. All of the men on this list have been and still are of the greatest importance in carrying on the work of the Navy Department. Nevertheless, I have felt that in order to carry out the spirit of the draft regulations I should not retain them any longer on the deferred classification list, even though in so doing it is going to be extremely difficult to replace them, and the actual work of the department will suffer without question. I have therefore directed that the requests for exemption of the clerks be withdrawn.

All over the country in shipyards, navy yards, ammunition factories, etc., technical employees, such as draftsmen, mechanics, inspectors, etc., are exempted and placed on the deferred classification lists, because it is impossible to replace them with technically trained men, and the technical employees for whom exemption has been requested by me, while they are working in the Navy Department proper at Washington, are just as important as the technical employees in the shipyards, navy yards, and ammunition plants, and they will be retained on the deferred classification list.

Respectfully submitted.

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

EMPOWERING PRESIDENT TO REGULATE OCEAN FREIGHT RATES AND TO REQUISITION VESSELS.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12099) to confer on the President power to prescribe charter rates and freight rates and to requisition vessels, and for other purposes. Pending that motion I will state that I have no requests for time for general debate. I would like to inquire of my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] if he desires any general debate?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I have had no requests, but I think there may be some.

Mr. ALEXANDER. What is the gentleman's judgment with reference to general debate?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I think we ought to have some general debate.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to one hour, to be confined to the subject matter of the bill, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] and one half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to one hour to be confined to the subject matter of the bill, one half to be controlled by him and the other half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have just had a request to amend that by making it one hour on each side.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman modifies his request by asking that general debate be limited to two hours, one hour on a side, to be confined to the subject matter of the bill, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] and the other half by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. ALEXANDER was then agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. BURNETT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk reported the bill by title.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, this is a companion bill to the bill which we considered yesterday (H. R. 12100) and is intended to vest in the President plenary powers to prescribe charter rates and freight rates and to requisition vessels during the period of the war. The power and authority vested in the President, or which may be delegated by him, and all the restrictions imposed by this act, shall cease upon the proclamation of the final treaty of peace between the United States and the Imperial German Government, provided that if, in the judgment of the President, the tonnage shortage at such time is so severe that the national interests of the United States are jeopardized he may, by proclamation, extend the provisions of the act for a further period of six months. The committee is of opinion that it is wise to insert that provision because we confidently expect after the war is over there will be such a great demand for tonnage, both on our part and on the part of our allies, that the President should have the power in order to meet the emergency to extend and exercise the powers conferred upon him under the provisions of this act for a further period of six months.

Section 5 of the bill provides:

That the President may, by proclamation, require that vessels of the United States of any specified class or description, or in any specified trade or trades, shall not be chartered unless the instrument in which such charter is embodied, and the rates, terms, and conditions thereof are first approved by him—

And so forth.

It is the judgment of the Shipping Board, concurred in by the Committee on the Merchant Marine, that this power should be vested directly in the President, to be administered by and through such agency as he may select. That agency no doubt will be the United States Shipping Board. The powers conferred by this section are at present being exercised indirectly through the control of bunkers and stores by the charter committee of the Shipping Board, but it was thought by the legal department of the Shipping Board that this power should be conferred directly upon the Shipping Board by express provision of law; and I think that there can be no reasonable objection to doing so.

Section 6 provides:

That the President shall have power to determine, prescribe, and enforce the freight rates and the terms and conditions of affreightment which shall govern the transportation of goods on vessels of the United States. It shall be unlawful to charge, collect, or claim any compensation for the transportation of goods on any such vessel, or to enforce or attempt to enforce any terms or conditions of affreightment, or to make or receive any payment or do any act with respect to such transportation, not in accordance with the rates, terms, and conditions so prescribed, anything in any contract, whether heretofore or hereafter made, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Under the shipping act the Shipping Board has power to regulate freight rates on vessels which are common carriers by water in interstate commerce on the high seas or the Great Lakes, but has no power to regulate or enforce rates on vessels which are not common carriers or to vessels engaged in the foreign trade, and I will say that the power is limited in its practical application to the Great Lakes and to coastwise trade. As I have said, the Shipping Board has no such power to regulate rates on vessels engaged in the foreign trade.

It is of the utmost importance that the President, for the period of the war, should have plenary power to prescribe reasonable rates not only in our coastwise trade and on the Great Lakes but especially in our foreign trade and then to enforce them as to all our shipping in this war period through such agencies as he may select. This power is exercised by foreign Governments as it may affect their ships, and it is necessary that our Government should have the same power. I am told that an overwhelming number of our shipowners are very cheerfully complying with the present requirements, which are enforced indirectly through the chartering committee of the Shipping Board, but there are always some who are not amenable to reason, justice, and patriotism. They may challenge the power that is being exercised at this time. Counsel for the Shipping Board informed the committee that there is already a disposition to do so. Hence, it is of the utmost importance that this power be expressly conferred on the President in such form as to be beyond question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume this bill is not framed under the clause of the Constitution granting power to regulate foreign and interstate commerce.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is strictly a war measure and exercises war powers.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill being framed with the idea that it is a war measure, with authority in the President under the war powers to fix rates, I wish to inquire whether under the bill there is any review by any court of the rates that may be fixed by the President or any agency he may appoint in respect to the use of the vessel.

In the railroad bill we passed, as the gentleman knows, there was express provision that the rates must be reasonable and just, and those rates were subject to review upon complaint by the Interstate Commerce Commission. While in this bill you make provision for an aggrieved person who is dissatisfied with the rates which may be levied for the use of docks, dry docks, and wharves to go to the Court of Claims and present his case, there is nothing whereby you give any aggrieved party the right to go to court to seek relief in case the rates fixed for the use of the vessel is unsatisfactory or what he regards as unreasonable and unfair. Have we the right to exercise that power without some relief being granted to the aggrieved party to seek relief in case he is dissatisfied with the terms or in case he thinks the terms fixed by the agency of the President are unreasonable and unjust?

Mr. ALEXANDER. We have the right, if this were not a war measure, under the Constitution, which vests in the Congress the power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce, to prescribe or vest in some tribunal the power to regulate and prescribe freight rates on ocean-going vessels, whether in the domestic or the foreign trades; but the point the gentleman makes is this, if I get his point, that while section 6 of the bill vests in the President the power to determine what these rates may be, we do not provide for a review by some other tribunal. It is my opinion that if the President should prescribe rates which are unreasonable and confiscatory, the party affected would have the right to go into a court of competent jurisdiction and challenge the reasonableness of the rates, without any express provision in this bill authorizing him to do so. We could not limit that right.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why do you recognize the distinction in the bill by granting the right to an aggrieved party when the President through any activity appropriates docks, wharves, and dry docks, and do not recognize that in express language when we appropriate ships or fix the rates which shall be charged for cargoes by those ships?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The dock, the warehouses, the lighters, the ships, are privately owned properties, and the bill very properly provides that they may not be taken over by the Government and used for public purposes, although it may be to meet an emergency created by the war, without just compensation being made to the owner. We could not do otherwise, unless we fly in the face of the provision of the Constitution, which says that private property may not be taken for public use without just compensation being made.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, I assume vessels of the United States, which is the term in the bill, refers to all vessels registered in the United States and that those vessels are private property. Wherein is the distinction between the private property whether wharves, docks, dry docks, and ships which are floating? They, too, are private property. The argument of the gentleman would go to the extent that even in the case of ships there should be some authority given so as to allow the owner to seek just compensation in case the rates fixed by the agents of the Government were not satisfactory.

Mr. ALEXANDER. There is a very wide difference between a ship which is privately owned and a rate fixed for some public service. To illustrate: A railroad car or locomotive may not be utilized in interstate commerce for the transportation of freight, but if the Government should take it over, it would be necessary to pay the owner the value of the car or the locomotive, but if that car or locomotive is to be used as an instrument in interstate commerce the Government may come in under the interstate-commerce provisions of the Constitution and regulate the rates that may be charged for the service.

Mr. STAFFORD. But this bill is not framed, the gentleman said, under the authority vested in Congress to regulate interstate and foreign commerce, and so I will go one step farther and ask whether the bill does not provide for the regulation of shipping that is purely intrastate?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I said under the Constitution the Congress has the power to regulate not only interstate but foreign commerce as well, and hence we might vest in the Shipping Board the power to regulate foreign commerce by water, and that power may be exercised in time of war as well as in time of peace.

But the gentleman says some of this shipping may be intrastate. Grant it; yet so far as these agencies are concerned, the power vested in the Congress by the Constitution to declare war, raise armies, and provide for the national defense, carries along with it all of the powers necessary for the successful prosecution of the war. We have vested in the President the broadest powers to take over not only ships but shipyards, steel plants, and other industries. We are commandeering many agencies that we might not take over or commandeer in peace times.

Mr. STAFFORD. But as to those ships which will be used absolutely in intrastate traffic, which will be the parallel of your dry docks and wharves, the gentleman does not provide any medium whereby the aggrieved party can go into court——

Mr. ALEXANDER. We do as to docks.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not as to ships purely engaged in intrastate traffic. Then, furthermore—and I will direct the chairman's attention if he will permit—when we were attempting to exercise the authority of Congress under that clause of the Constitution giving Congress the power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce, we have fixed what the Congress has determined would be a reasonable rate, and we authorized an agency of the Government to determine for us what that maximum reasonable rate is; but this bill that is reported by the committee of the gentleman is not framed on the idea of exercising that power, but, as the gentleman stated in the beginning, it is framed with the idea of exercising the war powers of the President. I am pointing out that there is no provision whatsoever in the bill which grants relief to the aggrieved party who may feel himself dissatisfied and thinks the rates which are fixed by the agency of the President are confiscatory and not compensatory.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I want just to emphasize the fact right now that we are discussing section 6. That is the section to which I am addressing my remarks, and we will take care of the other propositions when we get to them.

Mr. ROSE. My thought is that the question raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin this morning is the fact that in the railroad bill the provision is made for the aggrieved party not being satisfied with the rate to appeal to the court to secure justice from his viewpoint; but this present bill does not provide any proceeding of that nature, and that, therefore, there must have been a reason for its being provided for in the railroad bill, and a reason—the reason not disclosed—for its omission in the present bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The railroad bill gives the President the power to prescribe the rates of transportation, and the rates are subject to review by the Interstate Commerce Commission. This bill does not do so. It vests in the President the power, through such agency or agencies as he may choose, to determine what these rates and terms of affreightment may be. These powers are being exercised now in an indirect way through the power vested in the President under the espionage act and other acts. The Shipping Board, through the chartering committee, of which Welding Ring is chairman, will not let ships have bunker coal or let them have provisions unless they will agree to reasonable regulations, and in that way they are controlled; but it is an indirect, it is not a satisfactory, way, and it is questionable if the power which is being exercised might not be subject to serious doubt, hence the Shipping Board wishes the Congress to confer the power directly and place it beyond question.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. In section 6 it is stated that it shall be unlawful to charge, collect, or claim any compensation for the transportation of goods in violation of the rate so fixed.

Now, the rule is universally recognized that to fix a rate for transportation that is below the cost of transportation is confiscation of the property of the transporting company. Now, I understand the answer which you made a while ago is that he has his remedy in the courts for that, as the railroads had in enjoining enforcement of the rates when they were below the cost of transportation. But when you have the provision that it shall be unlawful to claim any compensation for the transportation in violation of the rate so fixed and then when in the sixteenth section you make it a criminal offense, punishable by a fine of not more than $5,000 or imprisonment of not more than two years, to do any of these things forbidden, do you not attempt to shut the door of the courts and everything else to the man who is being required possibly to transport something for less than it is worth? That is the question that is bothering me about this bill.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. When that railroad rate measure came up the condition was this, that the railroads had been put in charge of the Director General, and power was given him to fix rates. We had in existence the Interstate Commerce Commission, whose whole duty for 30 years has been the investigation and examination of rate questions. It was proposed in that bill to practically take the rate-fixing out of the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission and turn it over to the Director General, and we had quite a fight here in the House as to whether there should be a final decision as to the rates by the Director General or whether they should be reviewed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. My recollection is that we decided finally in favor of the Interstate Commerce Commission; that is, we gave the right of review to the Interstate Commerce Commission, though that was done over my vote.

Mr. STEVENSON. They have the right of review.

Mr. HARDY. They have the right of review.

Mr. STEVENSON. And it certainly has been justified by subsequent developments.

Mr. HARDY. I do not know of any justification or even application of it. In fact, I do not think there has ever been any such review. But, Mr. Chairman, in addition, if the Interstate Commerce Commission on its review should fail to do justice to a party thinking himself aggrieved, he still has a right to appeal to the court for reasonable rates. Now, in this bill the supposition is, and I have no doubt the facts will be, that the only body created and existing by law now that has taken unto itself a study of the shipping rates or has any authority is the Shipping Board. That body will be the body most likely designated by the President to fix these rates, so that it would be useless, if not absurd, to provide for an appeal from the rates fixed under this law to the Shipping Board, which occupies in relation to water rates the same situation that the Interstate Commerce Commission does as to rail rates. It would be providing for a review by the Shipping Board of rates fixed by the Shipping Board.

Now, one thing further. Assuming that these rates are fixed by the constituted authority, the Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation, whichever it is, under authority delegated by the President, this bill intends that the President through this agency shall fix the rate, but if they fix a confiscatory rate unquestionably the party affected would have the right to appeal to the courts without any provision here to prevent confiscation of his property.

Mr. STEVENSON. Now you come right down to the point of difficulty with me.

Mr. HARDY. Let me go further. I know the point you stated, but I did not get to it. You say that it further provides a penalty for violation of this section. But that must be understood to apply with regard to the final fixation of the terms or rate fixed under a proceeding by the court. In other words, if an injunction against the rate-fixing power was gotten out, and the court should hold the rate fixed was unreasonable, then it would not be a violation of the law to act in pursuance of the ruling of the court, but the rates fixed must stand until set aside by the court. And in time of war we must necessarily proceed to do things and adjust them afterwards. Sometimes we must act before all rights are adjudicated.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And I will say this, that it is the duty of the shipper to conform to that rate as long as it is in force. He can not ignore the rate and charge another and higher and different rate without becoming amenable to the penalty prescribed in the act.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield? Even in the railway bill we provided the rates fixed by the Director General should hold and rule until they were overruled by the other authorities.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will say this, that it is my recollection that that bill does not give the Interstate Commerce Commission power in the first instance, but only gives the power of review, and it does not give the Interstate Commerce Commission the right finally to overrule or set aside the rates prescribed by the President, as I recall. Their powers are hedged about by certain limitations.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am not going to be led off into that. The difficulty you have, and which I think you gentlemen have very learnedly avoided answering, is this: How can a man claim in court a higher compensation than that allowed when you say that it shall be a penal offense punished by fine and imprisonment to claim any compensation other than that which you fix under this bill?

Mr. ALEXANDER. If that is the gentleman's question——

Mr. STEVENSON. Just one minute.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I believe I have the floor, and I do not want the water to be muddied before I have a chance to clear it up.

Mr. STEVENSON. All right.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If that is the gentleman's difficulty, it may be the difficulty of others, for the gentleman is a good lawyer; and if the gentleman construes it to mean that a man may not go into court and make a claim for a different rate without being guilty of a penal offense, and to clear up that doubt I would not object to striking out the words "or claim" and make the section read "charge or collect any compensation," and so forth.

Mr. STEVENSON. I inquired specifically if he will not be debarred the right of bringing his action to recover the difference between the rate fixed and that. That is all the difficulty I have about it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I apprehend from what the gentleman states that the contention of the gentleman from South Carolina is that the language used in the bill is both calculated and intended to hinder and prevent a company from appealing to the courts against a confiscatory rate.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not think that it is intended to do that, but I think it is calculated to do it, and therefore it should not be allowed without a qualification.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Let us see. How could it have that effect as against rights afforded by the Constitution?

Mr. STEVENSON. But if you make it a penal offense for a man to assert his right under the Constitution, while that will not prevail, nobody here who has ever studied the law but knows that a man who is bold enough to go ahead and risk the chances of its being held unconstitutional and take the chances of getting in jail will be punished under this. But a great many people are afraid to go into court when they have got a penalty staring them in the face.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I am trying to ascertain the gentleman's objection. Does the gentleman from South Carolina think that we can forbid an aggrieved party from applying to the courts for relief against confiscation? Or is he afraid that the language used will have a deterrent effect upon a party contemplating such an appeal to the courts?

Mr. STEVENSON. It would not only have a deterrent effect, but he would be confronted with a penalty if he made a mistake, or if his lawyer, make a mistake, in bringing a claim.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. But if he proposes to exercise his constitutional rights, nothing that we can put in the statute would prevent him from presenting his case to the courts.

Mr. STEVENSON. If it were determined in advance that he has that right, well and good; but if it is provided in specific terms that he has not that right then——

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. A litigant always has the right to appeal to the courts against a rate that he claims to be confiscatory. We can not debar a man from the exercise of a constitutional right by making it penal for him to attempt to set up this right.

Mr. STEVENSON. You could not deter him from it, but you could intimidate him from it, because it is always a question as to whether or not he has the right. That is the reason why I brought up this question. I have always found the chairman of this committee ready and willing to make clear all disputed points.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly.

Mr. ROSE. It looks to me, considering the fact that this seems to raise a serious objection to the bill, as though there is no reason for the chairman not accepting some reasonable language as an amendment that would permit an appeal to be made to the court.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have no objection to doing that. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 10 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This act is to run only for the period of the war?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes, and six months thereafter.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was unfortunate in not hearing the gentleman's opening speech. Did he discuss the question of profiteering?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; I have not done so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I observe in the report on page 4 this statement, referring to the bill:

> And, second, that it will make this contribution at fair and reasonable rates, without that profiteering which has unfortunately characterized some aspects of the shipping business, both before and since the United States entered the war.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Where is the gentleman reading?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is on page 4 of the report. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the President in his last address to the House referred to profiteering in general terms, and that since that time there has been much discussion of it in the newspapers, the contention being on the part of some that there is an exaggeration of the facts in regard to profiteering.

I assume this bill has something to do with the assessment of freight rates, or at least their equalization, under the authority of the President?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman any specific information in regard to profiteering in freight rates?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Well, I know that ocean freight rates since August 1, 1914, increased from 500 to 1,000 per cent. I have been told that the freight money of many vessels on one voyage would equal the value of the vessel. I have been told that the shipment of coal from Newport News to Italy at one time cost as much as $50 a ton, and the effort has been made ever since, both on the part of our Government and on the part of the governments of our allies, to enforce reasonable freight rates on ocean vessels engaged in carrying foodstuffs, munitions, and fuel to our allies and vessels used by ourselves for military purposes. As you know, we are advancing very large sums of money to our allies in the way of loans, and we can not with any sort of complacency look on and permit that money to be used or paid for that kind of profiteering.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If there has been profiteering in ocean freight rates, it is not peculiar to the merchant marine of the United States?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, no. It was quite general.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. All nations have been indulging in it?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes. The allies were confronted by the same problem and have the situation pretty well under control now, and I am glad to say our Government has also, but, as I have had occasion to state in explaining the desirability of this legislation, the power is exercised indirectly through other agencies, and we are now conferring that power on the President directly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If by virtue of this act the President should proceed to trim the profiteers and regulate the rates, so far as Americans are concerned, what would be the attitude of other nations in regard to their shipping?

Mr. ALEXANDER. We provide that foreign ships operated by American citizens shall come under the operations of the law as well, and Great Britain, France, and Italy, I believe, exercise very complete control over their shipping.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We can not enact legislation affecting foreign nations, but has the gentleman any intimation as to what the President would do under the powers given him in this act to control the freight rates of the United States?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The shipping-control committee of the Shipping Board is composed of Mr. B. S. Franklin, chairman, Mr. Raymond, and Sir Connop Guthrie, of Great Britain, so that the control is international.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. One more question, if the gentleman will permit. I read in one of the newspapers the other night a statement that negotiations were pending for the purchase of a large part of the International Mercantile Marine holdings by English interests. Does the gentleman know anything about that?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I did not catch that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I say, I read in an obscure part of a newspaper the other day that negotiations were pending in England for the purchase or acquisition of a large part of the International Merchant Marine.

Mr. ALEXANDER. My attention has not been called to that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think Mr. Franklin, to whom the gentleman referred, has something to do with that organization. I wondered if anything of that kind was in contemplation, in view of the introduction of this bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The bill we passed yesterday is the one that is intended to prohibit by any device our shipping from passing under foreign control.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That bill is intended to keep the ownership and control in the United States, as I understand it?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will only delay the committee a moment longer. Section 9 gives direct authority to make rules and regulations regarding safety and protective devices in the war zone and to exclude vessels not fit for war-zone service from the submarine zone. This power is now being exercised indirectly both through the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, which charges an additional premium for vessels not properly camouflaged or armed, and through the War Trade Board, which denies bunker fuel and stores to vessels not suited for use in the war zone. In the main this indirect method of control is efficacious, but it is desirable that this power be directly conferred on the President.

Section 10 forbids the chartering of foreign vessels without the consent of the President. Of course, it is a necessary and an entirely legitimate measure of control over foreign tonnage. The President should be able to restrain the unregulated bidding for neutral vessels, which for a time threatened to unduly inflate the neutral tonnage market.

Section 11 perfects and expands existing law authorizing the requisitioning of vessels, and contains provisions which the experience of the past year in the practical administration of the Shipping Board's requisitioning program has shown to be essential.

At the proper time I shall offer an amendment to section 12, which has been agreed to by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, which will extend the power vested in the President under section 12 to prescribe the priority in which the persons in possession of dry docks, wharves, or terminal facilities shall serve vessels and shippers, but give him the additional power to determine, prescribe, and enforce the rates, terms, and conditions charged or required for the furnishing of such service.

Section 13, in connection with section 12, confers important additional powers over dry docks, wharves, loading and discharging facilities, and warehouse equipment and terminal railways. They may be requisitioned, or acquired by purchase or lease, the priority of services performed by them may be directed, and rules regarding the conduct of their business may be made. At present there is no power to control the activities of essential facilities of this character. They are free to charge what the traffic will bear, and to do whatever work is most remunerative. Since our entry in the war, rates for wharfage and the use of dry docks have soared to extortionate heights. At a time when the profits of shipowners are being rigidly limited it would be a serious reproach if owners of essential terminal facilities were permitted to profiteer without restraint. Since most shipping is now directly or indirectly for Government account, any unreasonable profits are made a charge on the Treasury of the United States, and should be prohibited.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the bill now under consideration is distinctly a war measure. I know it is fashionable to proclaim that fact regarding many bills which engage our attention, but this bill is really a war measure, and would not have been considered by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries at any other time since I have been a Member of the House. The provisions in the bill are made for the purpose of giving some control to the question of the chartering of vessels, perhaps a little more control than some members of that committee thought was desirable in regard to vessels of smaller tonnage; but, after full consideration and realization of its importance, the committee agreed to report the bill as now presented.

Some question has been raised here as to profiteering. That is a very common phrase since the war began. We realize that perhaps there is justification for some remarks on this subject. The question of freight rates and the cost of vessels is a very important one, and there has certainly been a very great advance in both of these important factors since the war began in 1914 on the other side of the ocean. Vessels that were supposed to be valueless have been repaired, put in commission, and sold at what would have been thought to be enormous prices at any time during the last 10 or 15 years. The charges for freight, both in the coastwise trade and in the over-sea trade, have been very extortionate indeed, and I agree fully with what the chairman of the committee has said about the question as it has affected our allies on the other side of the ocean. We are loaning money to these allies of ours, and it brings these nations into a large indebtedness to us. There is a variety of opinions in this country as to whether we shall receive from some of these countries abroad a return in money for what we have advanced and shall continue to advance to them until the war is concluded. Looking back historically to the time of the Revolution, we remember that France advanced to our weak and struggling Nation money and aided us in a great many ways, besides sending to us Gen. Lafayette and a gallant body of French troops to enable us to establish the Government under which we live. She was generous enough to remit to us some part of the money that we owed to her.

I would not be surprised myself if, when this war is concluded—if we all live to see it concluded—this country would be called upon by some of the nations abroad, if not all of them, to allow them a long limit in time of payment, if not an entire wiping out of any indebtedness that may have been incurred to us on account of the present war, for, according to my belief, these countries which entered the war before we did certainly bore a large part of our burden and defended our rights as well as their own in the terrible struggle with which they were confronted. So that if I should happen to remain a Member of the Congress when that question shall be determined I should certainly be strongly inclined to favor being very liberal in considering any claims that may be put forward by our allies for what I believe to be the exceedingly great work they have done in our behalf, not only by defending themselves but in protecting us as well against the encroachments of the enemy.

Under permission granted to me to extend my remarks I append a copy of a letter which I wrote in reply to a letter sent to me by Peter Golden, secretary Irish Progressive League, under date of April 26, 1918:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 26, 1918.

Mr. PETER GOLDEN,
Secretary Irish Progressive League,
321 Third Avenue, New York, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 18th instant came duly to hand and contents noted. You must recall that the Congress adopted the selective-draft act, for which I voted. This act was an administration measure and it was approved by President Wilson.

Under its provisions a large military and naval force were called "to the colors." The citizens of the United States were not consulted as to the advisability of the act. The men called are now on the fighting line "across the seas," under that compulsory call, for the purpose of aiding the allied nations abroad to resist the attempt of the German autocracy to overthrow their respective governments.

As a loyal American citizen and a member of the United States House of Representatives, I can not conceive it to be my duty to take any action in opposition to a proposal made by any foreign nation to conscript any of its citizens qualified to perform military duty, when their purpose is to secure soldiers or sailors to defend that nation from destruction or damage by the acts of its enemies. I can not believe that there are any great number of persons in the United States of Irish birth or ancestry, who would, after calm deliberation, indorse the ideas expressed in your communication, and I regret that you should at this critical period in our national life send such a communication to me.

Very respectfully,

WILLIAM S. GREENE.

This bill has provisions which I believe to be absolutely necessary. There is no feature of it to which I shall interpose any objection. This bill in many ways puts power into the hands of the President, or such persons as he may select, to regulate not alone the freight rates but the chartering of vessels both in the coastwise trade and in the over-sea trade, and I think it is perfectly proper that such regulation should be provided during the existence of the present war.

Our committee provided additional powers that were not included in the shipping bill when first presented, because at that time a great many of us did not realize the necessity which experience has shown to exist. The duration of the powers in this bill in section 3 certainly completes the suggestion made by the chairman and myself that this is a war measure, and no one need be at all disturbed by reason of the great powers that are granted.

In section 5 the President has power to require the charter of American vessels to be approved by him, or agencies through which he will act, to make certain that the vessels which may be built, purchased, or leased will be used for the purposes of "winning the war."

There were suggestions in the committee that this requirement might cause undue delay, and so I believe that might have resulted if the committee had required these acts to be done by the President alone; our belief being that, because of his multifarious duties, he could not perform the duty as easily as he could through designated agencies. Some members of the committee thought that vessels in the coastwise trade carrying cargoes from port to port ought to be relieved from this supervision and regulation, and amendments looking to that end may be presented for consideration.

The President also has the power, if he deems it necessary, to extend the time for six months after he issues his proclamation announcing the conclusion of the war. It is very evident, I think, that there will be occasion for an extension of that time even for six months after that period.

He has the power also to regulate the freight rates and terms of freight rates on American ships. There is another reason why the law is very necessary. It has come to our notice that possibly the Shipping Board itself may have, in the necessities of the occasion, gone a little beyond the powers that had been granted them in the original bill, and these provisions in this bill will make certain the power of the President and those whom he directs to carry out what experience has proven to be necessary, and it is hoped that this measure will prove to be an advantage to the people of the United States. It is believed that the law can be and will be so administered that it will prove advantageous to those who will come under its provisions.

I have not the figures of the immense advance in freight rates. I know there has been an immense advance in coal freight rates in the bituminous as well as in the anthracite coal trade and in the general shipment of merchandise in the coastwise trade. That advance has arisen through the great demand occasioned by the law of supply and demand. The supply of vessels has been very much limited, and the demand has been great. The natural result is that people who own vessels suitable for transporting coal and manufactured articles have taken advantage of the opportunity to make money both before and after the war had been declared.

Now, I am not objecting to people making money. I believe it is necessary that they should. I am not going to attempt to say that any man or corporation transacting business should be so restricted that he can not make money. If you are going to take that line and carry it out by undue exactions from men who have to make money you will soon ascertain that when you need money to meet outstanding obligations or to provide the necessary amount to carry on the war that the burden will fall upon those who can ill afford to bear the burden.

What I want is to win this war. This bill is intended to be for the purpose of helping to win the war, and at the same time while you regulate the freight rates you do not want to regulate them to the extent that people who build vessels at enormous cost will not be able to get a fair, reasonable, and perhaps unreasonable rate for the use of their property which they put at great risk when they go upon the seas. Of course it is not as safe to travel across the water now as it was before the war. We know there are quite a number of men in the House who voted for a proposition to restrict Americans from sailing across the water on vessels owned by belligerents engaged in war and liable to be torpedoed. I think some of these people who took that ground had rather too much faith in our present enemy across the water—that he was held up by some agreement or regulation or peace conference at The Hague or some other place, whereby he would be governed by what afterwards proved to be in the eyes of the Kaiser and his followers mere scraps of paper.

So I think we want to be very careful in all the considerations of this and similar bills, and not to draw the line so closely that there will not be an opportunity for people to invest their money at the present high prices and to get their money back, if not a little more, because many men who go into business are not satisfied with simply getting their money back, they want to make a little profit for themselves and their families. I am not of a nature that I want to prevent any man from making money. Business has been good of late, and I hope it will continue as long as the war lasts, but I do not want the prices to become so high that they will be unduly burdensome.

The question of storing, lightering, bunkering, and all similar matters were considered very fully by the committee. We had some very competent testimony called to our attention wherein we thought perhaps it was well not to restrict those privileges and that we had better not include these provisions in the law. The more the committee thought about it, however, the more we were convinced it was well to put in all the restrictions that are contained in the bill; also as to the dry docks. By the way, I might say that I believe to-day that we ought to build a great many dry docks, because during the war, and even after the war is concluded, these dry docks will be of immense value if we are to properly repair and care for the American merchant marine, which we are now constructing, and these dry docks will be advantageous in promoting our foreign trade after the war.

I have been a believer in an American merchant marine—not exactly in the way provided by establishing the Shipping Board, because I believed in having an American merchant marine a long time before the Shipping Board was ever thought of—and have always advocated it on this floor and elsewhere and have always believed in the necessity for it in time of peace, and everyone believes that it is a necessity of the war. I am a strong believer in it to-day, and if there is any criticism that I could possibly make of gentlemen who have opposed that necessity in the past, it is that they were not willing to do a single thing—a few on the Republican side and a great many Democrats on the other side of the aisle; in fact, a large majority of them—to build up an American merchant marine. It was not confined alone to the men of one party, because I could possibly move my hand and touch some men on the Republican side of the House who thought it was not necessary, because they happened to live in a mountain State and away from the salt water. They thought there was no necessity for an American merchant marine.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. As I am the only person within reach of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and as I also come from a mountain State, I assume that he refers to me, and if that is his reference I desire to say to him that he is entirely mistaken.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Then I take it all back.

Mr. MONDELL. I have always voted with the gentleman for the establishment of a merchant marine. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I take it back, and I am glad to know that. My memory may not be very good upon that one subject. I will take it all back and I will wipe it out of the RECORD and give the gentleman a good standing.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, he may leave it in the RECORD.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Very well. I came on to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries the very day that I came into the House, now more than 20 years ago. I was appointed by Speaker Reed, and I am the oldest member of that committee now, with the longest service, and during that time I never have been backward in favoring the upbuilding of an American merchant marine and I never have been afraid of the word "subsidy." I do not believe that any Democrat ought to be afraid of a subsidy after the action they have taken since this war began, because they have spent money more rapidly than I ever could have imagined money could be spent by the Congress for this very meritorious object. I never imagined there could possibly arise any proposition out of the Democratic side of the House that even war would bring them to such standard that they would vote such enormous sums for the building of an American merchant marine. I congratulate them that they have at last occupied the ground upon which I firmly stood 20 years ago and believed in many years previously.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman, after reading the politically patriotic utterances of the Vice President in Indianapolis yesterday, say that the Democratic Party could be accused now of having subsidized the shipbuilders of the United States?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I think they could be, without the slightest question of doubt and no opportunity to make a denial. Certainly they have subsidized them beyond all imagination—yes, even of a radical Republican like myself, for I never had the slightest imagination of any such exhibitions or recantations of their party platforms.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman venture to think the Democratic Party has gone beyond a subsidy?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Oh, yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And has actually provided Government money for the purchase and construction of ships?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is an easier way to get ships than by the old subsidy method, is it not—much easier?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Oh, yes. I suppose they would argue now that it was a law of necessity.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman must concede, in view of what the President has said about "politics being adjourned," that it is improper for the Vice President of the United States or any of the rest of us to discuss politics under the circumstances.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I am not going to undertake to control the President or the Vice President of the United States in their political actions. They appear to be a law unto themselves.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think he could control the Vice President in the Indiana campaign?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. No; and I do not desire to. I think he will be so badly whipped in the Indiana campaign that he will forget that he has ever been an active figure in Indiana or national politics.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman thinks the Vice President is likely to do the best he can for his party, notwithstanding what the President said?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I believe he will do that, and I shall not yield my political convictions or desert the party which has so signally honored me, and I hope every other Republican will not hesitate to do his full duty. I do not anticipate there will be any weakness in the Republican ranks, and I do not believe there will be any exhibition of weakness on the Democratic side. I think they are going to claim a great deal and get away with it if they can.

Mr. HARDY. As I understand it, we are all in hearty agreement and the gentleman believes as we do that we are on the highway now to building up a great American merchant marine.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I do; and I am very glad to notice they are building ships in Texas, and I will frankly state that I never expected to live to see that day. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] was a very strong opponent of doing anything for the coastwise or the over-sea trade, and I never expected in my lifetime to hear that anyone would ever drive a nail in a ship in Texas. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We are doing all this, then, not by the hateful subsidy system but by digging into the Treasury and taking the money out direct?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Why, certainly; and the most we ever thought of in the prosperous days of the Republican Party was to spend about $5,000,000 a year, and that was such a horrifying sum that we could not get the votes of our own party and practically no votes from the Democratic Party. The money that we wanted to spend for the upbuilding of the merchant marine was just that limited amount I have mentioned in order that the United States might come into proper competition with people from abroad who could build vessels a great deal cheaper than we could and man them a great deal cheaper than we could and control them a great deal cheaper than we could. We merely wanted to make up the difference in cost. Then there was a familiar argument of some of the men who lived in the interior that we did not need any merchant marine.

They said if we established a merchant marine the cost of the vessels to be built would be so great and the cost of management so large that we could not do anything in competition, and furthermore it would raise the price of freight in carrying the products of the farms and factories abroad, therefore we should not build and maintain an American merchant marine. This war has settled one thing, and clears that situation up in the minds of a great many people, and I hope it will clear it up in the minds of all the people. That clearing up is knowledge of the fact that after the grain and other products reach the shores to be carried across the sea the freight rates are made on this side and are paid by the persons who receive the freight on the other side before the vessels leave these shores, and that these freights are not paid by the producer, but they are paid by the consumer.

I believe these facts settle the much-discussed question that if we build up an American merchant marine we are going to raise the price of freight unduly after the merchant marine is established. If we produce the merchant marine and have competition, we shall certainly be able to reduce the freight rate. It has been the experience of all persons in regard to all these propositions that the freight has been reduced rather than increased. So that while there are some things in this bill I would not have answered for under ordinary circumstances, I cheerfully support the bill as it is presented to-day. I believe it is a proper bill to present at this time, and I shall vote for it, and I think there will be but little opposition to the bill when the final vote is taken. [Applause.] I yield the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not represent a maritime section. In fact most of my acquaintance with shipping has been with that kind of shipping known as "prairie schooners," and in view of that lack of intimate knowledge of the general subject I have some hesitancy about making any suggestion relative to a bill having to do with shipping, particularly before gentlemen who do know a great deal about it and who have given the matter, from the present standpoint and viewpoint, a great deal of careful consideration. Before I go to a very brief discussion of two sections of the bill I expect to refer to I want again to remind my good friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] that though I represent a people 1,800 miles from the seacoast and from 1 mile to 1½ miles above sea level, I have always supported in this House, and I have had no very considerable criticism at home on account of that support, a program for the building up of the American merchant marine. Our people were intelligent and farseeing enough to realize that an industry of this sort would be as helpful to those who live in the interior as those who live on the coast. The gentleman from Massachusetts has well emphasized the fact that we delayed building up our merchant marine until we were compelled to do it by war conditions. In that connection it might be well to recall that we are now paying heavily for our delay. It is costing us from two and a half to three and a half times as much per ton for our shipping as we would have paid for it three or four or five years ago. We have been fearful in the past of the competition of British shipping on account of their cheap construction. As a matter of fact, we are paying in some cases for cargo vessels nearly four times as much in cost per ton as cargo vessels cost to build five and six years ago in British shipyards. This great cost is going to have a very profound effect on the shipping business after the war ceases, and it will require careful management and wise legislation to get us safely and satisfactorily over a condition that will be created by the very high cost of our present construction. However, the ships are absolutely essential and they must be built, even though the cost be very high.

Now, Mr. Chairman, coming down to the bill, again expressing my somewhat of embarrassment in discussing a measure of this kind before men who know more than I do about it, I want to submit just a few observations on sections 5 and 6. These sections propose the fixing of charter and freight rates by the President through such agency as he may provide, in this case I assume by the Shipping Board. The object and the purpose is sound I think beyond question, but I have some doubts about the propriety of the provisions which have been enacted for the purpose of insuring this Federal control over charters and freight rates. Particularly section 5, with regard to charter rates, it seems to me that it would have been better to have provided that the President should fix maximum charter rates wherever it was necessary that be done and then prohibit any charter rates above the maximum so fixed. What has been done is to provide that no charter contracts shall be entered into until the charter rate and provisions have been approved by the agency that the President shall provide.

It strikes me that is a good deal as though in the matter of the regulation of railroad freight rates we had provided that in each case the shipper in carload lots should not ship from any station anywhere in the United States until the contract of shipment and of rates should have been approved by a board here in Washington or some local Federal official.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield me five minutes more?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not want unduly to take up the gentleman's time. Manifestly we would never have had proper freight movements under any such provision as that. What was done was to give the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to fix a reasonable rate and the shipper shipped with the knowledge of what that rate was. I do not pretend to know enough about this business to know how much delay might be caused by the provisions contained in section 5; but it seems to me in the case of short voyages and small boats, where the charter contract might frequently change, there might be a very great deal of delay under the provision which if carried out as evidently intended in the bill might require the reference to a board here in Washington, or some Federal official somewhere, of every charter contract. It would be very much better, it seems to me, and the same result would be accomplished by laying down general rules regarding the maximum charter rates.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think the gentleman has not read the language of the section with care. It would be impracticable for the President to prescribe the charter rates on each vessel. It says:

That the President may, by proclamation, require that vessels of the United States of any specified class or description, or in any specific trade or trades, shall not be chartered unless the instrument in which such charter is embodied and the rates, terms, and conditions thereof are first approved by him.

In other words, there will be a general provision applying to certain vessels of a certain class and description, or in certain trades, and those regulations will be enforced as to all vessels in such class or trade and will not involve delay. There has got to be a general broad bill——

Mr. MONDELL. May I say the language of the bill seems to require the approval of each charter contract——

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, no.

Mr. MONDELL. I think that is a fair interpretation. Of course, until the President brought shipping under regulation nothing would be required.

But if the President by proclamation should bring the coastwise shipping or foreign shipping, or all coastwise and foreign shipping, under these provisions, it seems to me the language of this section would require the submission of the charter contract in every case to some official to visé and approve before that particular contract could be carried into effect. Now, if the language was modified a little, so as to do what I assume my friend has in mind, bring that charter contract within certain limitations, then there need be no delay. There would be a general rule, or a rule applicable to certain conditions, that would apply in all cases and would not result in delay.

Mr. HARDY. It was the purpose of the committee in this bill to provide in a way a kind of standardized charter applicable to certain classes of vessels, and when a vessel was placed by the President's proclamation in a certain class it would take its line of charter from that proclamation and that class.

Mr. MONDELL. If that could be done under this legislation, it would be all well and good; but I doubt if it could be done. I think that under the legislation it would be necessary to submit to examination every charter contract for approval. I do not think there could be any general rule.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I was going to ask the gentleman from Texas if he did not believe, nevertheless, that every charter must be submitted to some authority?

Mr. HARDY. I think unquestionably that is true. It would be submitted to the Shipping Board under this proclamation of the President.

Mr. MONDELL. Every particular charter?

Mr. HARDY. Every particular charter in the language as it now is.

Mr. MONDELL. Just how much delay that would entail I do not pretend to know, but it occurs to me it might lead to a very great deal of delay; and I am of the opinion—and I am not prepared to suggest language, but I think perhaps the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE] is—that there might be a modification of this language under which a general rule could be laid down, which, being complied with, there need be no visé or approval of the particular charter so long as it came within the general provisions.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is not expected the President will exercise these powers directly. It is expected they will be exercised through agencies, and in the Shipping Board there is a committee through whom these powers, I presume, will be exercised.

Mr. MONDELL. I realize that; but it seems to me the language of the bill is not happy in that it would compel those having charge of these matters to require the presentation of the charter contract in every instance, no matter how brief a period it might cover or how insignificant the ship might be.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Do I understand that if this measure becomes a law it would include all the shipping on the Great Lakes as well as on the ocean?

Mr. MONDELL. It might include the shipping on the Great Lakes and on all the rivers and include a charter from one harbor to another 20 miles away or a charter on any one of the interior rivers.

Now, it seems to me the criticism I have just made applies also to section 6, which relates to freight, although I think the language of that section might possibly be construed to admit the fixing of a general schedule of rates which could not be exceeded; but one reading section 6, and interpreting it in accordance with the ordinary rules of construction, would be led to believe that very often in the matter of a freight rate it would be necessary to refer to some Federal agency, perhaps hundreds of miles or thousands of miles away, questions with regard to the freight rates on a small shipment of goods by boat. Clearly the committee did not intend that any such condition should arise, and still that is exactly the condition I fear under this bill.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. It was intended to have agents in various shipping ports to meet that condition.

Mr. MONDELL. But even then, let me say to my friend, who knows a great deal more about this than I do, that we ought, it seems to me, to follow the rule that we follow in land shipments of fixing the rate so that the shipper would know the rate and not be required to submit his rate in every case to the approval of some officer before he could make the shipment.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think the intention of the committee was to do precisely the thing you say it was not its intention to do.

Mr. MONDELL. If it was the intention of the committee to require submission to an official of every shipment, no matter how small, every charter contract, no matter how brief the period covered or how small the ship, they have carried out their intent perfectly in the provisions of the bill, but I did not understand that was their intent; and if that was not their intent, but if their intent was to simply fix Federal control and provide for reasonable rates, then these two sections need amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS].

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, in ordinary times I would not support one section of this bill, but the war emergency has shown the necessity of legislation of this character in order to regulate the movement of men and munitions, together with the facilities necessary to expedite such movement, and I feel it is our duty to pass it. The experiences during the past few months of the departments interested in the conduct of the war have shown the necessity of the legislation, and it has been the earnest desire of the committee to present a bill in which the ordinary course of trade shall be disturbed only for such a time as it is absolutely necessary to accomplish the war purposes.

It will be noted all through the bill that power is given the executive department by regulation to require certain conditions in connection with shipping which can either be enlarged or modified as necessity shows the wisdom of the action.

This is rendered necessary by the varying conditions which govern the transportation of goods by water, and, in my opinion, is wise, as from the present outlook it will not be very long before it will be found possible to spare ships from the transport and supply work necessary for the support of our Army and our allies for the purpose of entering the carrying trade handling commercial business. I believe I am warranted in making this prediction when we consider the waning activities of the submarine and the enormous production of shipping tonnage in sight at our shipyards and those of our allies.

The bill provides in sections 5, 6, and 7 that charters or terms for freightment should be under the control of the President. I believe that this provision is wise and good.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Suppose there should be disparity between rail freight rates and water rates, which it is contended there is at the present time. Would it be up to the President just now to adjust those rates in order to give transportation a square deal with the railroads?

Mr. EDMONDS. You mean, of course, railroad rates?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. I presume the President, through the railroad bill and this bill, would have the power to do so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If it appeared, by reason of the preference now given to railroads under Government control, that certain water lines were being discarded, it would then be up to the President under this bill to adjust the water rates so that they might be made to conform to the rail rates, if that were desirable.

Mr. EDMONDS. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The power to fix rates on inland water lines is given to the President in this bill?

Mr. EDMONDS. He is given the power to fix the rates on any shipping, on the rivers or lakes or anywhere, just as he desires.

The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] made a statement here as to maximum rates on the lakes and rivers. This gives the President the power, wherever he finds it necessary, to fix the freight rate, no matter whether it is on a boat going on the Ohio River or the Mississippi River down to New Orleans, or whether it is on a boat on the Great Lakes or on a car on a railroad.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The President has now the power to fix rates on railroads?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Under this bill he would have the power to fix water rates on inland lines?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; he would have the power to fix water freight rates on inland lines.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So that if there was any unfair competition anywhere he would have the power to adjust it?

Mr. EDMONDS. Under this bill he would have the power to adjust it.

These three sections—5, 6, and 7—deal directly with the fixing of freight rates. They give the President the power, if he desires to establish a maximum rate, also to establish a regular rate for certain trades, so that I do not see why the committee would have any objection to giving the President the necessary power during this emergency.

Section 8 authorizes the extension of the three sections to foreign vessels under charter to American citizens. Section 9 gives direct authority to make rules and regulations regarding safety and protective devices in the war zone, and to exclude vessels not fit for war-zone service from the submarine zone. This is a very important section.

Section 10 takes up the charters of foreign ships in the future, being subject to the approval of the President or such board as he selects. Section 11 perfects and expands existing law authorizing the requisitioning of vessels, and contains provisions which the experience of the past year in the practical administration of the Shipping Board's requisitioning program has shown to be essential.

Section 12 sustains the priority order, which is also contained in section 6, and confers power over the facilities necessary for loading ships and for taking care of their cargoes. Under section 13 the President has the power to requisition these facilities, if necessary, or to purchase them, if necessary. Section 14 provides the machinery for just compensation.

Section 15 states what shall be done with any funds that are paid into the different boards originated by the President to carry out the provisions of this act and determines how the money is to be disposed of. Section 16 provides penalties for the violation of the law and section 17 refers to the constitutionality of the provisions of the act.

I would like to call to the attention of the committee that under other different activities of the Government many of the provisions of this act have already been operative, the necessity being so great that these agencies were utilized to accomplish results.

While such actions under the general bills given to the President containing powers for the conduct of the war are undoubtedly within the letter of the law, it is far better for us to pass legislation of this kind defining in detail the powers granted the executive departments than to have the matter to be carried out in an indefinite manner, such as could be done under the present general acts.

A question has been raised here by some gentleman as to what the foreign powers are doing. I have here the English War Cabinet Report of 1917, presented to Parliament by command of His Majesty, and published in London in 1918. I would like to quote from this report. It says, under the head of "Transport":

> The outstanding effort of the ministry of shipping has been so to organize and redistribute the nation's ships that, in conjunction with the policy decided on for the restriction of import of nonessentials, ample supplies should be maintained for civilian and war needs. With such good results has this been done that in the summer of 1917 we actually imported more grain and flour into the country than in the summer of 1916. The quantity of goods brought into the country fell off considerably at the end of 1916 and the beginning of 1917, but during the summer, owing to the reorganization of shipping, there was an excellent recovery. For example, each of the months of July and August the cargo imported was scarcely below the monthly average of 1916 and exceeded by over 500,000 tons the quantity of cargo imported in December, 1916. In June and July we imported nearly 500,000 tons more of grain and flour than in the same two months of 1916.

Now, this is what I want to particularly call the committee's attention to:

> These striking effects have only been accomplished by a drastic treatment of the problem. At the end of 1916 the proportion of tonnage which had been requisitioned by the State was less than one-half of the whole. A large proportion of tramp shipping had been requisitioned, but by far the greater part of the liners remained unrequisitioned and was licensed to continue to trade in the accustomed routes. In the course of a few months practically the whole of the British ocean-going mercantile marine has been brought under requisition at Bluebook rates.

I can not explain Bluebook rates to you. I have been trying to find out what they are, and perhaps at a later date I will, but I presume that they are the established rates. I read further:

> All tramps have now been requisitioned save in certain special cases, and this means that the increase in the number of tramps on full requisition is about 500. The whole of the ocean-going liner service has also been requisitioned, and this affects about 800 vessels.
> This practically complete requisitioning has proved of immense service. First and foremost, by enabling the withdrawal of ships from the longer trades and their transfer to the shorter, it has secured for the Nation an enormous addition to its cargoes even while its shipping has fallen in quantity. Quick instead of slow returns have greatly increased the carrying capacity of the vessels so diverted by the saving in time occupied on each voyage.

A little further on it says:

> There is no question that prior to the adoption of a system of practically complete requisitioning profits made by shipowners were so great as to cause grave disquiet amongst the public. The shortage of shipping caused by the war had rushed freights up to figures enormously in excess of anything paid in the past. These freights materially added to the cost of food and other essential materials, and strong criticism was directed in the press and on public platforms against such earnings going into private shipowners' pockets.
> As the control and practical direction of British ships became more and more complete it was of increasing importance to adjust to the vital needs of the nation the various demands for tonnage arising in the different departments. A tonnage priority committee was therefore set up, upon which each department of state concerned with the nation's supplies is represented. The committee having before it the demands for tonnage, estimates the amount of cargo it is possible to carry and is enabled so to coordinate the various requirements as to secure the best possible distribution of carrying capacity. So far the task has been accomplished in such a way as to insure that no section of the national need has gone unsatisfied.

I just want to call the attention of the committee to the report of the war cabinet. It is very complete, and I presume each one of you has a copy of it in your office. But I would like to say this, that in carrying on this war we must handle the shipping business in such a manner as will prevent profiteering and will place the ships in the trade to which they are best adapted and which is most advantageous for the movement of our goods. I trust, gentlemen, that you will pass the bill.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. In the opinion of the gentleman is the need of this legislation as great for interior shipping, like that on the Great Lakes, as for ocean shipping?

Mr. EDMONDS. Only in so far as it can be used to prevent profiteering.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. And that is entirely a business proposition, for the protection of the people, and not for the safety of the Government in this time of war.

Mr. EDMONDS. Profiteering has an effect on the price of the commodities that are transported via these water routes. I should like to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that a great many ships have been taken off the Lakes——

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That is true.

Mr. EDMONDS. And it may be necessary for the President to establish on the Lakes a priority board, to say what necessary work these ships may do; that is, the remainder of the ships left upon the Lakes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. There is a rumor to the effect that the Director General of Railroads is dissatisfied with some of the low rates by water, and that he would like to have them increased, to the ultimate advantage of the railroad properties of the country. I presume if this bill should become a law the administration would have the right to increase the water rates, making them practically the same as by rail, and so depriving communities now having low rates by water of that advantage which they now possess.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think that is probably true. I do not see that there is anything in the bill to prevent the administration from either advancing or decreasing rates.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Does the gentleman, as the result of his investigations, know of any feeling like that, that the Director General of Railroads would like to see rates by water increased for the protection and advantage of the railroads?

Mr. EDMONDS. I never had any intimation from anybody to that effect.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Does the gentleman see any real need for including the interior transportation lines in this bill?

Mr. EDMONDS. So far as the power to requisition is concerned, and to utilize the tonnage and other facilities, I should say that it was necessary, and that this bill would cover conditions that have arisen on the Lakes. As a matter of fact, I believe the price of wharfage in Buffalo has been put up so high that it has had an effect upon the utilization of the Erie Canal. I think that is correct, is it not?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; and while conditions are not as acute on the Great Lakes as they are in the ocean trade, still anything that increases the price charged for the transportation of a commodity necessary to the winning of the war is just that much of an additional burden on the Treasury. I should regret very much to have the water transportation rates on the Great Lakes increased in order to help the railroads. I never heard any suggestion of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. COX). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman from Missouri want to use any of his time now?

Mr. ALEXANDER. How much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has 20 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Massachusetts 21 minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think it is necessary to take up the time at my command. I wish to say only a few words. When this bill came to our committee it was a wide subject with many particulars, and we entered into the consideration of it with a full concession of the necessity of very great investigation. I think nearly every section in the bill has been rewritten half a dozen times. After we got it into the shape that it is in I believe that any Member of Congress, if he had been with us, would have gone with us to the end and would have agreed with us in the conclusion we reached, because every single phrase in the bill was discussed, and we were almost, if not quite, of one opinion as to every part of it.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, while I voted in favor of reporting this bill, and while I am supporting it, there are several sections in it and there are phrases in it which I do not personally like. I should like to interpolate that statement.

Mr. HARDY. I am glad that the gentleman has made that statement. He states the exact fact. In the final framing of the bill the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE] stated that there were some phrases in it, and I believe in sections 5 and 6, that he had some doubt about. If I remember correctly, he voiced a good deal the same sentiment as the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] expressed a few moments ago. The fact was simply this as to these sections: The first criticism was that it would require a great deal of detailed information in approving and passing on each charter. Representatives of the Shipping Board, however, said to us that section 5 had practically been in operation under the implied powers of the Shipping Board, and that they had found no practical difficulty in applying what they were asking the express authority to do here. In other words, the testimony was as to this section that the powers conferred are at present being exercised indirectly through the control of bunkers and stores by the charter committee of the Shipping Board, and they testified before us that the chartering committee found no practical difficulty in executing the provisions of this section. That answers really the criticism made by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and the objection in the mind of the gentleman from Maine, I think, in objecting to section 5.

Now, section 6, giving the rate-fixing power, and section 5 are both so general in their terms as to make the application of them as ready and easy as it is possible to be. I am sure that if you undertook to parse the words and phrases in which to grant the power which we will all agree is absolutely necessary to win this war, you could not compress them into terms and words any more concise than the language we have placed in these sections. We might have gone into great detail, incumbering the bill with a thousand particulars and incumbering its administration with a thousand difficulties. The more general you can make the terms of a bill of this kind the easier it is in its work. I have been one of those who hold that view in reference to railroad regulations. I believe if you could embody railroad regulations in general terms and leave the administration to work out specific matters it would be better.

That is the effect of sections 5 and 6. The President issues his proclamation classifying all ships subject to this law. The charter committee of the Shipping Board sees to the administration and to the issue of each charter just as each business is given a license. We have the authority now to license nearly every business in the United States. It must be done under general regulations, and so with the question of freight rates the rates will be fixed, not for a particular vessel, but for a class of vessels, and all vessels under the dominion of the Government or Government administration must apply the general rates fixed.

Now, I think possibly an interpolation of one word might be advisable in section 6. It says that the President shall have power to determine, prescribe, and enforce the freight rates. I think it might be strengthened if we said reasonable rates. I do not think he could prescribe anything that was not a reasonable rate anyhow, but I have no objection to placing that in there and then it would be well understood that if a confiscatory rate were adopted they could appeal to the courts. That, I think, however, is immaterial. I think the rates prescribed must be reasonable, anyhow.

As a matter of fact, there is this peculiar thing about this bill. It affects the widest interests of the Nation in one of the greatest American industries. The whole shipping of the United States is interested, and there has not been from the shipping interests one syllable or scintilla of protest. They seem willing to join all their energy, united with the power of legislation in Congress, to win the war. I feel that in presenting this bill there was by every member of the committee but one motive, and that was to so coordinate the powers of this Government as to put every ounce of our strength and capacity into the ultimate winning of the war. We should not haggle over technical ideas or possible difficulties, but we want to pass a bill that in our judgment will contain the essential elements for the control of shipping, making available every ounce of our strength and capacity toward the winning of the war. I believe that practically this bill as it comes from the committee needs no alteration or amendment, except the amendments that we have agreed to. I have taken more time than I intended to.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my excuse for consuming any time on this bill is because it applies to inland waterways and will affect very materially the commerce in and around western Pennsylvania, with which I am quite familiar and upon the rivers which extend into my district.

Sections 5 and 6 are, of course, the storm centers of this bill. They are unconstitutional, I believe, because they violate the fifth amendment to the Constitution, which provides that "private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation."

This section 5 provides that the President shall have the right to classify all vessels of the United States and shall have the right to fix freight rates such as he may approve.

That classification would include the navigation of the Mississippi, Ohio, Allegheny, and Monongahela Rivers. These rivers are traversed by passenger steamers, towboats, barges, and freight boats. There has been no advance in freight rates by these boats since the war broke out, there has been no profiteering, and there is no necessity for this legislation. These steamers run between points that are competitive with railroads—for instance, between Pittsburgh and Morgantown, Pittsburgh and Wheeling, Pittsburgh and Wheeling and Cincinnati. These are in direct competition with railroads that parallel the river on either bank. They have, of course, been compelled to make a rate so low that it will get them the freight, and they have had to maintain that rate. The Interstate Commerce Commission has had no control over the steamers, but has, of course, over the railroad rates. It is proposed to upset that whole existing arrangement. It is proposed to come in here and give the President the power to classify these steamers and fix the rates by which they must operate. The owners have no right to appeal; no matter what the President does, no right of appeal is given under this clause. The gentleman says that the owners if dissatisfied could go into the courts. They can not under this section, but later on, where the bill applies to wharves and docks, the owners if aggrieved have the right to take 75 per cent of the price offered and appeal as to the other 25 per cent. Under sections 5 and 6 there is no such right given.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the provision applying this bill to the inland water traffic and passenger and freight transportation by boat is in direct violation of the wishes of the people that patronize these boats and the business that has been developed along the Ohio, Allegheny, and the Monongahela Rivers. Therefore I say that there ought to be an amendment added to this bill providing that it shall not apply to inland rivers and canals. I do not know so much about the Great Lakes and I have no complaint about the traffic on the Great Lakes.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman spoke of the paragraph here authorizing the payment in case of disagreement upon the price of property taken, either ships or docks——

Mr. ROBBINS. That applies to docks.

Mr. HARDY. Docks and ships also—the payment to the party if he does not agree to the terms tendered of 75 per cent.

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. And giving him the right to go into court to obtain whatever else over that amount may be just. Can the gentleman conceive of any parallel proposition to a freighter, where you would allow him, say 75 per cent of the freight charged, and then go into court to determine whether or not he should pay the other 25 per cent?

Mr. ROBBINS. To whom do you say?

Mr. HARDY. To the man paying the freight. Suppose the freight rates are fixed too high, and the man says that it is too high. Can the gentleman imagine any parallel provision that could be put in sections 5 and 6 to this, with reference to taking property?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes. You should have made a provision that in the matter of rates he should have the right to appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission as was provided in the railroad bill, in section 10, where the right is given to appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission and have the question of rates reviewed and corrected.

Mr. HARDY. I do not know whether the gentleman was in the House when I made an attempted explanation of the bill——

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes; I heard the gentleman's explanation and I do not want him to repeat it in my time.

Mr. HARDY. Would not the appeal in this case be to the Shipping Board in lieu of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. ROBBINS. No. The Shipping Board is going to be the agency of the President to fix these rates.

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is the same as appealing to the President himself. The President, in the first instance, fixes the freight rates, in the case of the railroad bill, and there is the right of appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission to review that rate.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman recognizes that the Shipping Board holds exactly the same position with relation to waterways that the Interstate Commerce Commission holds with reference to railroads?

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not recognize that. In section 2 of the bill you provide that the President may exercise the power and authority hereby vested in him "through such agency or agencies as he shall determine from time to time." That would be the Shipping Board, which will be the President himself. He who acts through an agent acts himself. There is no appeal given here. The whole authority is vested in the President, as in the Shipping Board, and he could fix a rate for a class of vessels that ply on the inland waterways of the country that would be absolutely confiscatory of their property.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I will grant him five minutes if he wants more time.

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman say that there is no remedy to a shipper if the Shipping Board, as the agent of the President, should fix a rate that would be confiscatory? Does he say that it is necessary that it should be expressly written in the law?

Mr. ROBBINS. There is nothing in this bill that will give the right of appeal, so far as the matters referred to in paragraphs 5 and 6 are concerned.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Can you take that right away? Suppose we would say in the bill that he should not have the right?

Mr. ROBBINS. Then the clause is unconstitutional if it attempts to take property "without due process of law" or "just compensation."

Mr. ALEXANDER. That provision of the Constitution does not apply. I did not know that a rate is property within the meaning of that provision of the Constitution.

Mr. ROBBINS. And I think the gentleman well understood that when he wrote in the end of the bill that if any clause should be held unconstitutional the rest of the bill should stand. These two paragraphs might be declared unconstitutional and the remaining provisions of the act stand.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, no. I hardly think that provision of the Constitution does not apply to a rate in the sense in which the gentleman would apply it. In this bill where we take docks or ships which are private property we provide a method by which the value may be ascertained.

Mr. ROBBINS. In passing, I want to say that I am heartily in favor of the enactment of this bill in its general purposes. I believe in encouraging our foreign commerce. I have always been a friend of the development of the merchant marine of the United States, and I believe that when the merchant marine of the United States dwindled, as it did prior to this war to practically nothing, it was because we did not subsidize our ships and protect them in every way, as other nations do, that we made a very grave mistake. We are going to finish this war with one-fourth of the tonnage of the whole commercial world, if the war continues for another year. Therefore this bill, or some similar bill, should be enacted for our protection; and while this bill is only a war measure, the next Congress, educated by the operation and the working of this bill, the majority—if they are in control, which I hope they will not be—seeing the benefits of this temporary legislation, will enact, I sincerely hope, a permanent measure for the encouragement of the over-seas commerce of the United States. But the proposition that perplexes me now is why should a bill of this kind be made so general in its terms that it will apply to commerce on rivers in my district, such as the Monongahela, Allegheny, and Youghiogheny Rivers? There we have lines of boats that ply and compete for freight and passenger traffic, and have for half a century.

Mr. HADLEY. The gentleman is aware that these provisions as to rates are really permissive? They are authorizations, and so long as the mandatory condition applies neither to foreign or domestic commerce, if the authorization is outstanding, is the gentleman fearful that the President will exercise a power because there is such authorization merely because it exists? If profiteering does exist, should it not be exercised? If profiteering should manifest itself on inland waters and in domestic commerce, why should not the President have the authority to meet that condition when it presents itself as well as in foreign commerce?

Mr. ROBBINS. There is no profiteering; the necessity does not present itself; there is no occasion for this sort of legislation on these rivers. I happen to know something of the navigation on the rivers in and around Pittsburgh and in my district in western Pennsylvania. I am not speaking of the other rivers, because I do not know the conditions that prevail on them; but I am speaking of the general principle when applied to these rivers. I know the situation on the Ohio River as far as Wheeling, and on the Monongahela up to Morgantown. There has been absolutely the same line of boats on them for years, and I have seen them since this Congress convened, and they have practically the same rates of freight to-day that were in effect years ago; and to put these boats under the control of a board here in Washington so that every time they make a rate to carry coal or freight traffic or passengers they must consult the Shipping Board and obtain a right to enforce such rate from such a board here in Washington, I say would be unfair and unnecessary and extremely burdensome and annoying.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Would it not be possible and altogether likely that under the provisions of this bill the President, or whoever may be charged with the responsibility of fixing rates, might make very much higher rates for the river and Great Lakes traffic than now prevail?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. ROBBINS. I have been interrupted, and I thank the gentleman very much, and I do not know that I shall use all of it.

That is one of the dangers.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what I think.

Mr. ROBBINS. I suggested a moment ago with that thought in view that it might be developed that rates that had been effective on this river between Morgantown and Pittsburgh in direct competition with the railroads, or between Monessen and Pittsburgh, between McKeesport and Wheeling, would be radically changed by the President or this board, and the river traffic entirely destroyed. Now, then, it is suggested here that the railroad rates have been raised arbitrarily by the Director General of Railroads, without notice to anybody, overnight as it were, and that the railroads with these higher rates will come in competition with the cheaper existing rates on rivers and lakes. Then what will happen to the water rates? They will be reduced by the President, of course. Now, gentlemen of the committee, have you thought about this: That in order to keep the traffic on the railroads, that will naturally seek the lowest means of transportation, the President will have to reduce water traffic?

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will permit, I do not know anything about by what authority this statement was made, but this statement has been made to me, that it is proposed to increase the rates on the Erie Canal in order not to interfere with the competition, or rather not to create competition, with the New York Central Railroad. Now, if any such disposition is in the mind of anybody, regardless of whether this law operates for it or not, it ought to be dissipated, and I think one way to dissipate it is to provide the proper amendments which will enable the people of the United States to continue to be the beneficiaries of the low water-rate transportation which exists throughout the United States on the Great Lakes and inland waters.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is certainly very true. We are spending on the Ohio River this year $5,000,000. We have spent heretofore, I do not know accurately how much, but it must be at least $10,000,000 or $20,000,000, in constructing a system of navigation by locks and dams from Pittsburgh clear down to Cincinnati and on to Louisville. Now, if the people are not to receive any benefit from this wonderful expenditure of the people's money to develop cheap water transportation; if we are to place by this bill all water transportation in the hands of a Government board, and they are to raise the rates because railroad rates are higher, in order to preserve railroad traffic and not allow freight to drift to the rivers, the people have spent their money to provide cheap transportation in vain, and this use that is going to be made of this bill is wrong. Therefore I say that sections 5 and 6, giving that arbitrary power to the President, ought to be amended to exclude the rivers from its provisions. I do not mean because I oppose sections 5 and 6 in their present form that I am against the bill; I am going to vote for it even with both of those sections in because of the great good the bill is going to do in the breaking up of war profiteering on the seacoast.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will permit, I have just talked with the chairman of the committee about the possibility of the thing happening to which I called the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and he calls my attention to the fact that we passed a law some time ago in which we provided that the regulation of the traffic movement on the lakes and inland waters should not be affected by the legislation that we are passing covering ocean travel. This law, as I am assured by him, does not repeal the provisions of the original law. If that is true, then there is not any objection to the enactment of this law.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The shipping act applies only to interstate commerce, coastwise and on the Great Lakes. The provision of section 18 is:

That every common carrier by water in interstate commerce shall establish, observe, and enforce just and reasonable rates, fares, charges, classifications, and carriers, and just and reasonable regulations and practices relating thereto, and to the issuance, form, and substance of tickets, receipts, and bills of lading, the manner and method of presenting, marking, packing, and delivering property for transportation, the carrying of personal, sample, and excess baggage, the facilities for transportation, and all other matters relating to or connected with the receiving, handling, transporting, storing, or delivering of property.

We do not disturb existing law at all.

Mr. ROBBINS. That act does not apply to the Monongahela and Ohio Rivers.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, no.

Mr. ROBBINS. It applies to the Great Lakes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It did apply to all our inland waters when it passed through the House.

Mr. ROBBINS. It does not now?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It does not now.

Mr. ROBBINS. In its present form.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. I will.

Mr. PLATT. Is it not true the Director of Railroads practically did fix the rate on the canals at the same rates paid on the railroads?

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not know.

Mr. PLATT. It was so stated. The rates on the Erie Canal were fixed the same as the rates on the New York Central. Unless——

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not know anything about the rates on the canals and I am unable to answer. I do know about rates on the river, and I know some of the rates have been obtaining for years and years in competition with rail rates, and I do know this bill makes it possible to raise those river rates and deprive the people of cheap water rates which they have long enjoyed.

Mr. PLATT. They have been raised, have they not?

Mr. ROBBINS. No; they have not been raised on the Monongahela and Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That when used in this act—

(a) The term "United States" includes any State, Territory, or District of the United States, the insular possessions, the Canal Zone, and all lands or waters subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

(b) The term "person" includes corporations, partnerships, and associations.

(c) The term "charter" means any agreement, contract, lease, or commitment by which the possession or services of a vessel are secured for a period of time, or for one or more voyages, whether or not a demise of the vessel.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 1, line 9, strike out the word "and," and before the period insert a comma and the following: "States, municipalities, and other subdivisions thereof."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That all power and authority hereby vested in the President or by him delegated and all restrictions imposed in this act shall cease upon the proclamation of the final treaty of peace between the United States and the Imperial German Government: Provided, That if, in the judgment of the President, the tonnage shortage at such time is so severe that national interests of the United States are jeopardized, he may, by proclamation, extend the provisions of this act for a further period of six months.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "Imperial."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: Page 2, line 9, strike out the word "Imperial."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I object to that. Our declaration of war is against the Imperial German Government.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Just a moment. I desire to discuss it briefly. It is true that the declaration of war was against the Imperial German Government, but the treaty of peace may be with the Imperial German Government or it may be with the German Government as it then exists. I do not believe we ought to even by intimation presume in this matter that the treaty of peace we are to make shall be with the present Imperial German Government. It may be with a republican form of government. It may be with some other form of government. I do not believe it is wise in all of these acts that we pass to designate that the treaty of peace that we are to make will be with the present Hohenzollern régime in Germany.

It is a rather immaterial matter to me, but it occurred to me that it was unwise to express it in this way. Nobody can tell at this time whether the present Government will continue to exist or not. I do not see any reason for including the word "Imperial." I think it ought to be stricken out for the reason I have stated. The chairman says we declared war against the Imperial German Government. That is true, but that is no reason why the treaty of peace that shall end this conflict shall be with that Government.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman is indulging in a hope that I doubt will ever have fruition. If as one of the results of this war the Hohenzollern dynasty in Germany shall be overthrown and a republic erected in its stead, I am sure we and mankind generally would have reason for congratulation. In framing the bill we simply followed the language of the declaration of war. We declared war against the Imperial German Government, and I apprehend that that is the Government with which we will have to determine the terms of peace. There is no evidence now of disintegration of the Hohenzollern dynasty or that a republic will succeed the present Imperial German Government.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. This act specifically declares that all restrictions imposed in this act shall cease upon the proclamation of the final treaty of peace between the United States and the Imperial German Government. I want to ask the chairman this question. Suppose some other form of government is set up in Germany; what do you say then about the effect of this act? Will it be presumed as a matter of legal intendment that the then existing government, although it may be some other form of government, shall be the government included in the meaning of this act?

Mr. ALEXANDER. If there should be any obstacle in the way, we could remove it; but it is so remote it has never engaged our serious attention.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It would be impossible to anticipate and put into terms of law another government at this time. It seems to me we had better leave that as it is. But I want to call the gentleman's attention to this: That we are not at war with the Imperial German Government only, but with Austria, and I merely suggest that the gentleman consider whether there might or might not be an amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I really do not think it is important. Whenever we come to terms with Germany I imagine Austria will be out of the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the President shall have power to determine, prescribe, and enforce the freight rates and the terms and conditions of affreightment which shall govern the transportation of goods on vessels of the United States. It shall be unlawful to charge, collect, or claim any compensation for the transportation of goods on any such vessel, or to enforce or attempt to enforce any terms or conditions of affreightment, or to make or receive any payment or do any act with respect to such transportation, not in accordance with the rates, terms, and conditions so prescribed, anything in any contract, whether heretofore or hereafter made, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I want to call the attention of the chairman to this language, which has bothered me considerably:

Anything in any contract, whether heretofore or hereafter made, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Do I understand by this language that the President may make such changes in rates or contracts as he desired, and that any preexisting contract shall be held to be null and void if it comes in conflict with the rules that the President has made? I believe I am right in my construction of this language. Now, the question in my mind is this, is this sort of a provision legal? Is it within the constitutional power of Congress to enact? I am thoroughly in sympathy with this bill and practically all of its provisions, but it occurred to me as I read this particular language that a contract might be in existence between some shipowner and some individual or some corporation, or some State, if you please, by which certain rights had accrued to it, and that this contract, by the operation of this act, if it is good, might be absolutely voided and be held as of nothing. And this is entirely contrary to my ideas of what our constitutional powers are.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What particular section or provision of the Constitution does the gentleman have in mind that this language is violative of?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In answer to the gentleman, let me say that Congress can do such things, I take it we will all agree, as are conceded by the Constitution. There is no provision in the Constitution that I know of that confers upon Congress the right to void preexisting contracts, unless it is the general clause of the Constitution that provides that Congress may pass the necessary acts to provide for the common defense and welfare.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does not the gentleman recall the constitutional provision vesting in Congress the express power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce, and is not that the power that is invoked in regulating rates in interstate and foreign commerce?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes. But there is nothing in that that will provide you can void existing contracts by which rights have accrued to an individual.

Mr. BANKHEAD. My friend will remember the provision of the Constitution as to the violability of contracts, but that it provides no State shall have the power to pass a law violating an obligation.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I remember that. It is in section 10 of Article I of the Constitution. If I remember correctly, it is provided that no State shall pass laws that violate the obligations of a contract. But nowhere in the Constitution, if I understand it correctly, is any power given to Congress to pass acts violating the obligations of contracts. And unless we have that power I do not see how it can be done.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will say to the gentleman that it is inconceivable to me, in view of the express power vested in the Congress of the United States to regulate interstate commerce, that anybody might make a contract for a rate that the Congress might not, by enforcing that provision of the Constitution, make null and void.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Well, it is not inconceivable to my mind. I have to say in regard to this matter that I simply wanted to call it to the attention of the committee and the chairman, not with the hope, perhaps, that any change would be made in the provision, but simply to express my fear that this particular provision of the act may hereafter be held to be illegal by our courts.

It appears to me that it goes beyond our constitutional power. I do not believe that Congress has such power that it can, without reason or without justification of any kind, except the mere desire of some administrative officer of the Government, avoid and do away with the obligation of a preexisting contract.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend page 3, line 11, after the word "enforce," by striking out the word "the" and inserting the word "reasonable."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ALEXANDER: Page 3, line 11, after the word "enforce," strike out the word "the" and insert the word "reasonable."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I simply wanted to say in regard to that insertion that that changes the section appreciably, in my judgment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] had already suggested that I offer that amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Many of my remarks might not have been necessary if I had known that the gentleman was going to insert that word.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield, as to the effect of his amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Suppose the President, in the exercise of the powers granted him under this law, should fix an unreasonable rate. I am at a loss to know what remedy the shipper would have for the redress of his grievance.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. He would not have any.

Mr. BLACK. Even if it should be confiscatory, what remedy would he have? As I understand it, no court can mandamus the President or issue an injunction against him. I would like to know what protection a shipper would have in the event the President should prescribe an unreasonable rate.

Mr. ALEXANDER. These powers would be delegated to the Shipping Board, and I do not see any reason why it should not be enjoined from enforcing a rate.

Mr. BLACK. Suppose the President issues an order himself fixing a certain rate. I should think the shipper would be absolutely helpless.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, just a few words with respect to the criticisms of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], first as to the reasonableness of the provision to which he objects, and then as to the sufficiency of our power to enact and make effective that provision.

The committee used the language found in the bill for the very obvious reason that otherwise at times the Shipping Board would be utterly unable to determine, prescribe, and enforce reasonable freight rates, since it would be confronted in many instances with contracts made in anticipation of the establishment of such rates. In such cases, the parties would undertake to say to the board: "We have entered into contract relations about this matter, and are therefore protected against your attempt to regulate and prescribe our rates." The committee desired to make it entirely clear that no such attempt by way of anticipation on the part of anyone could be made effective to thwart the purpose of the bill to give ample power to the agencies that this bill creates to establish, prescribe, and enforce reasonable freight rates and reasonable terms and conditions of affreightment.

With respect to the power on the part of Congress to avoid the contracts to which I have referred, it is merely necessary to cite in support of the same the absolute and plenary power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce. It has been announced time and time again by the courts, that Congress possesses all the powers necessary to make effective any powers that are lodged in Congress by the Constitution. Hence it follows that, if we can regulate interstate commerce, we are clothed with the power to make that regulation effective by avoiding, if we choose to do so, any private contracts sought to be set up in the way of contravention to such regulation. The provision itself is, I think, a wise one, nor do I believe that it will work out any results of inconvenience or hardship.

But whether it is wise or unwise, it is abundantly manifest that Congress enjoys the power, by virtue of its authority over interstate commerce, to avoid any contracts made by way of anticipation in the attempt to defeat the establishment of reasonable rates.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I can readily see why the committee would desire to prevent contracts being made in anticipation of the enactment of this law, and for that purpose I can readily see why it would be necessary to provide that from and after such a date—from the time of the introduction of the bill, for example, or something of that kind—it would be necessary to have such a provision. But I doubt the necessity of making it so sweeping as it is.

But what I would like to ask my friend, who is a jurist of wide experience, is if he knows of any instance where Congress has by the enactment of any law set aside a contract which, but for that law, would be in full force and effect? I understand, of course, that the provisions of the Constitution only forbid the States from enacting laws which impair the obligations of a contract, but I recollect of no instance where Congress has undertaken to do anything of that kind.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will say to my friend that I do not now recall any particular Federal statute which undertook in express terms to avoid some particular contract; but although I can not at this moment place my hand on the appropriate authorities, my general understanding is that there have been many instances in which the effect of congressional legislation has been to avoid and render of no effect contracts that had been theretofore made. In all the discussions to which I have listened, or in which I have taken part in this connection I have never heretofore heard any doubt cast upon the power of Congress, in the exercise of the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution, to do what is proposed to be done by this section. I have no doubt that if given time I can support this statement by many appropriate instances.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman will yield to me, I had occasion very recently to make an examination of that question in the Supreme Court Library, and I think I can furnish the gentleman, in a short brief which I made on that proposition, the citations which confirm absolutely the suggestion just made by the gentleman.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I am obliged to my friend for the support which he brings to my contention.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 5 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I suggest to the gentleman that we wait until we finish the bill and then return.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I object for the present, but before we get through we will take up that matter.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say just a word on that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will be recognized for five minutes on a motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. GRIFFIN. If we are going to legislate here with the idea that we are going to get any recourse out of the Supreme Court in the event that the rates fixed by the board established by the President are considered to be unreasonable, we are barking up the wrong tree. On June 3 the Supreme Court of the United States handed down a decision in a draft-board case, where an application was made for a mandamus to compel the board to do certain things, and the decision of the Supreme Court in effect was that the act of the local board and of the draft authorities was an administrative act, the act of the President, and the court refused to entertain jurisdiction of the proceedings.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend section 6, line 10, by striking out the word "President" and inserting "United States Shipping Board."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 3, line 10, strike out the word "President" and insert in lieu thereof "United States Shipping Board."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, when the railroad-control bill was before the House for consideration some time ago I took the emphatic position, which was also taken by a great many other Members of the House, that the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission over freight rates ought not to be impaired. I do not think that the determination of what are just and reasonable freight rates is an executive function, and therefore no such power should be conferred upon the President. I do not think it was ever contemplated by the framers of our Constitution that even in time of war the President of the United States should ever be delegated such authority. The power to prescribe just and reasonable freight charges is a legislative duty and therefore a congressional function. This power to fix rates is the power of the people, which they delegated in the Federal Constitution to their Representatives in Congress, and, of course, we all understand that it is impractical for Congress to sit as a board to determine rates, because it can not have the facilities of information at hand or the time to deal with such matters in their minute detail. Therefore it has created an agency, to wit, the Interstate Commerce Commission, to do this thing so far as railroad transportation is concerned. And now our merchant marine is attaining such proportions that it is necessary and proper to create some board or commission with the right and the power to fix and determine the rates on water transportation, with the understanding always, of course, that the courts have the power to review such rates and determine whether or not they are confiscatory. That is a right which we could not take away even if we wanted to. But I submit that we ought not to confer a rate-making power upon the President of the United States, because our Government is a Government of three distinct branches, and it is not at all necessary to abrogate the functions of either branch even in time of war. One of them, of course, is the legislative, another is the executive, and the third is the judicial. The President of the United States can not go to the Supreme Court and tell them what he wants done in a pending decision, and he would not, of course, attempt it. The President can not come to Congress and command that we pass a law, and neither can Congress control the President in the exercise of his executive functions under the Constitution. The courts of the country could not go to the President, if he fixes a rate under this section 6, and say, "Mr. President, you have fixed a rate that is unreasonable, a rate that is confiscatory upon the rights of the shippers, and therefore we demand that you lower it."

The courts of the country can not issue a decree of that kind, at least I do not think they possess any such authority. Therefore this rate-making power is one we ought not to confer upon the President. But under this section 6, which we are now considering, we ought to confer it upon the United States Shipping Board. If that board, in the exercise of its proper function as a rate-making body prescribes a rate that is confiscatory, that is unreasonable, then the shipper or the carrier may go into the courts of the country and have his redress of grievances. I call the attention of the House to the fact that the act of September 7, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a United States Shipping Board, and for other purposes," contains the following provision:

Whenever the board finds that any rate, fare, charge, classification, tariff, regulation, or practice, demanded, charged, collected, or observed by such carrier is unjust or unreasonable, it may determine, prescribe, and order enforced a just and reasonable maximum rate, fare, or charge, or a just and reasonable classification, tariff, regulation, or practice.

Therefore, I submit that it would not only be in harmony with the spirit and intent of the Constitution to confer the rate-making power on a board created by an act of Congress, such as the United States Shipping Board, but that is what we have already done in a previous act of Congress.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I will.

Mr. ROBBINS. I think there is a great deal in the gentleman's idea that there ought to be a different authority for fixing this rate. Does not the gentleman think it ought to be the Interstate Commerce Commission, because of the competition between rail and water rates, and because of the vast machinery and accumulated knowledge that the Interstate Commerce Commission has on that question of rates, that the new Shipping Board would not have?

Mr. BLACK. I do not know to just what extent the Interstate Commerce Commission have made a detailed study of water transportation. Probably they have, and perhaps that commission would be a very competent body to fix such rates. But while we are on this subject, I think undoubtedly the rate-making power ought to be fixed either in the Interstate Commerce Commission or in the United States Shipping Board, and probably best in the Shipping Board, because we have already enacted similar legislation in the act of September, 1916.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Is it not a fact that in the shipping law the regulation of rates in interstate commerce by water is lodged in the Shipping Board, and does not this section at least suspend that law?

Mr. BLACK. That is my understanding. And another thing that we might as well give some thought while we are considering this law, and that is this: We confer upon the President the power to transfer to any other agency that he may select this rate-making power. Under the railroad-control law the Director General of the Railroads has the power to initiate rates. The President might see proper to delegate the authority granted in section 6, now under consideration, to make shipping rates to the Director General of Railroads, and he would have the absolute power to do it. We have only just a few days ago had an experience which should awaken Congress to the danger of being too free in conferring the rate-making power as an executive function. The Director General of the Railroads issued an order—No. 28, I believe it was—putting into effect general increases in freight rates, supposed to have been on an average of 25 per cent. He provided that they should apply to intrastate traffic as well as interstate traffic. When the railroad commissioners of the different States began to analyze that order it is claimed that in many cases the freight rates would be increased from 200 to 300 per cent on intrastate traffic. Therefore a general complaint went up from all over the country, and I understand the Director General intends to modify his order and to change the effect of it.

An illustration of this kind serves to illustrate very forcibly the great necessity of conferring the freight rate-making power upon some board or commission that has facilities for gathering information necessary to inform it as to how and to what extent rates ought to be lowered or increased. And where the action of such board can be reviewed by a court of proper jurisdiction, so that if mistakes, errors, or wrongs are found in its orders the court can grant the proper relief to the shipper or carrier.

There are other administrative powers and duties conferred in the bill upon the President which I strictly favor and approve, for instance, as in the very next section, No. 7, which says that the President shall have the power to prescribe the order of priority in which goods may be carried or other service performed by any vessel of the United States, and so forth.

That is a perfectly proper executive function in time of war and there are many other similar ones provided in this act, such as the authority to requisition ships, with which I am in thorough sympathy and accord. But, on the other hand, I am just as positive in my conviction that the proposition to determine what are just and reasonable freight rates should remain with the United States Shipping Board where Congress placed it in the act of September 7, 1916.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I was present, as was the gentleman from Texas, during all the discussion on the railroad bill. I remember very well that the question as to how the regulation of rates should be conferred, whether upon the President or upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, was one of the important questions which was settled by this House. I think that the House in this bill will deal with the question the same as it did with the railroad bill. In the end the power was retained in the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The gentleman who has just taken his seat suggests that the power be now conferred on the Shipping Board. It is not my understanding that the Shipping Board was instituted for fixing rates.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Under section 18 of the shipping act the Shipping Board has plenary power over rates in the coastwise trade and on the Great Lakes, over common carriers by water. They have that power now.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I am glad the gentleman has told me that. I asked a member of the committee, because I was in doubt about that point. The members of the committee with whom I conferred advised me that the Shipping Board was exercising that power, but they did not understand that it was within the act.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Section 6 confers on the President the power to regulate freight rates and the terms and conditions of affreightment on American ships. This is a power at present conferred on the Shipping Board only with respect to common carriers engaged in coastwise trade and on the Great Lakes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. All I wanted to say on the question is this: The gentleman from Texas was in some doubt as to whether or not the Interstate Commerce Commission had dealt with water rates, had made a study of it, and whether there were decisions on those matters. There is no doubt about that matter. The Interstate Commerce Commission for many years dealt with the question of interstate rates, combination rates by water and by rail, and there are abundant decisions upon that question, and there are many landmarks to which we all could refer. However, if, as the chairman says, and he no doubt is right, there is already a provision conferring this power on the Shipping Board, the simple substitution proposed by the gentleman from Texas will make this act accord with section 18 of the general act; the gentleman's amendment is in accord with both acts, the general act and this act, and should prevail.

Now, I want to say that it hardly seems possible that the acts of the President would be immune from review by the courts any more than the acts of the Interstate Commerce Commission. If, as a matter of law, the fixing of rates is an attribute of the power of Congress and we confer it upon any other body simply because we can not sit and determine these questions, it does not seem to me to be material whether we confer the power upon the President or upon any other body. The act of the agent would be subject to the same review, because the power remains ultimately in the same body, and it is simply an exercise of the power by delegation.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will.

Mr. BLACK. The courts may have jurisdiction to review a thing, but when they want to enforce the judgment, how can they do it? They can not issue an injunction or mandamus to the President of the United States, because if they did it would be void and of no effect.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas would not be germane to the provisions of this bill, in my judgment. This is a bill to confer on the President power to prescribe charter rates and freight rates, and to requisition vessels, and for other purposes. Section 2 provides that the President can exercise the power and authority vested in him through such agency or agencies as he shall determine from time to time. It would be within his power to exercise it under the provisions of this bill through the Interstate Commerce Commission. But I assume that the Shipping Board will be the body to whom will be delegated the power, for the reason that the shipping act vests in the Shipping Board the power to regulate water rates in the coastwise trade and on the Great Lakes, and gives the Shipping Board very comprehensive powers regulating transportation by water, not only in the coastwise trade and on the Great Lakes but in the over-seas trade as well. But the power vested in the Shipping Board to regulate rates does not extend to the regulation of rates in over-seas trade, for reasons it is not necessary to explain now. Whether or not the board should have that power in peace times is one of policy. We could give them that power.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does he construe section 6 of this bill as repealing section 18?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, no; not at all. It does not interfere with it in any way. It does not suspend it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I may be wrong about it, but, as I understand it, at present, as the gentleman just stated, the Shipping Board has the power to regulate rates in interstate commerce on ships.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; on common carriers by water; but the gentleman knows that a large part of our commerce is carried in what we call tramp ships, and they do not come within the provisions of the act, and our purpose was to extend the power so that the President, acting through such agency as he may designate, would have control over not only common carriers by water and tramp ships in the coastwise trade but in the foreign trade as well.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Suppose an American ship, one of those ships now being constructed, were engaged in interstate commerce, who would then have the power?

Mr. ALEXANDER. If it was a tramp ship, the Shipping Board would not have any control over the rates. If it was a common carrier, within the meaning of the law, and engaged in interstate commerce, the Shipping Board would have control of the rates under section 18 of the shipping act.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And the President would not?

Mr. ALEXANDER. If he delegates the power to the Shipping Board as regards the vessels——

Mr. LONGWORTH. But suppose he does not? I am asking for information. Section 6 of this bill gives the President power to control rates on all American ships.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Whether engaged in interstate commerce or not.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would not that repeal to that extent, or suspend during the war, the control now exercised by the Shipping Board?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It might render unnecessary the exercise of the power vested in the Shipping Board under section 18 of the shipping act, but the purpose and intent of this provision is to extend the power so that they can control the rates of vessels to which the act does not apply. If the provisions of the shipping act had been broad enough to include all traffic of vessels, whether common carriers or tramps, whether engaged in coastwise or foreign trade, there would have been no necessity whatever for this legislation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Suppose this section is not to be construed as repealing section 18, at least during the period of the war, would not that leave a concurrent jurisdiction in fixing rates, so far as the coastwise trade is concerned, with the President and the Shipping Board?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I assume that the President will delegate this power to the Shipping Board so that the same tribunal will exercise the power in both instances.

Mr. LONGWORTH. He might or might not.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, well, that is understood.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It seems to me that the law is not very clear on that matter.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It would be a very anomalous situation if he should delegate the power to some other tribunal.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is not all you seek to do by section 6 then to extend the power of the President in fixing rates on foreign commerce?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; not on foreign commerce alone.

Mr. DEMPSEY. And tramp steamers in coastwise trade. Is that it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is intended to give the President power through the agency to whom the power will be delegated—full power to regulate the rates on all classes of water transportation to which I have referred.

Mr. DEMPSEY. If it gives him full power, and the Shipping Board has part of the power now, then it must repeal section 18.

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; I do not think it repeals it. If the power now vested in the Shipping Board has been broad enough, there would not have been any occasion for this legislation, because the power now vested in the Shipping Board applies only to vessels that come within the definition of common carriers and in the coastwise trade and on the Great Lakes. It is rather an extension or amplification of the power.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question, because I would not want to do anything that would impair the purpose of this bill. If it is to be assumed that the President will delegate this authority to the United States Shipping Board, then, resting on that assumption, the adoption of my amendment would really confer the rate-making power where it is evidently intended by Congress it should rest.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think it would be unfortunate if we should undertake to divide up these powers. The bill is drawn upon the theory that these powers shall be vested in the President and shall be exercised through such agencies as he may select.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In relation to this matter, as I understand it, contracts for affreightment and freight rates on coastwise ships are at present subject to approval by the United States Shipping Board, from what the gentleman has said. Suppose contracts have been entered into on some coastwise shipping line, fixing certain rates and charges which have already been approved by the United States Shipping Board, and this act is passed with section 6 in it. Then these contracts thus approved may be, if the President desires, voided, if I read this correctly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will say to the gentleman that as a matter of fact the Shipping Board has never yet undertaken to exercise any of the regulatory powers vested in them under the shipping act. The board was created in February, 1917. The war ensued in April, and their time and energies have been devoted to the shipbuilding program; but the powers that we seek here to vest in the President are exercised now indirectly through the charter committee of the Shipping Board and through the power vested in the President in the espionage act to control the export of commodities. For instance, vessels are not allowed to have coal or supplies unless they conform to those rules, and it has worked very well, in the main, but the power may be challenged, and while we are enacting the law, in the opinion of the counsel of the Shipping Board, it ought to be put beyond any question and the power directly vested in the board, for it is a situation that must be controlled, and that, too, very effectively, if we are to prevent profiteering at the expense of the Treasury.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The thing I am trying to get at is, I do not very much like to vote for a measure, however much I may favor it, if I thought I would thereby do some injustice to somebody who had entered into a contract in good faith. Of course, the chairman of the committee has an intimate knowledge of the situation, and if any contracts of that kind exist he would probably know of them.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will say this, the provisions of this bill, together with the report, were printed in full in the Journal of Commerce, in New York, and other papers in the country, and never to this moment have we received a protest from any source whatever, and really, if the people directly interested have not any fears it is not necessary for us to have any fears. If there were any such contracts now in force we would very likely have had our attention called to them.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to get this matter straight in my mind; it is not yet. Let me read the gentleman from his report with regard to section 6:

> Section 6 confers on the President power to regulate freight rates and terms of affreightment on American ships. This is a power at present conferred on the Shipping Board only with respect to common carriers engaged in coastwise trade. The extraordinary inflation of freight rates due to the ship shortage renders it imperative that the President should have this power with respect to all vessels in all trades.

Now, does not section 6 of this bill suspend at least during the war all power of the Shipping Board over any vessel in any trade?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Let us concede it does, then what?

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is what I asked the gentleman and I understood the gentleman to say "no."

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not think it does, but assuming it does, then what?

Mr. LONGWORTH. If it does, then the President, of course, may confer on the Shipping Board power to regulate freights on all vessels, or he may reserve it to himself, or give it to someone else.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly, he could do that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is what I was not clear about.

Mr. ALEXANDER. This is a war measure and applicable during the war.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then, it suspends during the period of the war all the regulatory powers of the Shipping Board?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not think so, but this additional power may, as a matter of fact, be vested in the Shipping Board by the President.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not under the law.

Mr. HARDY. If the gentleman will permit me to make this statement: There are quite a number of things to be done under the authority of this bill. It may be found necessary to use one agency to do one thing and another agency to do another. We might have adopted and divided those agencies up and said the President should do this through this agency and that through this other agency, and to have divided it into a dozen different fields of activity under this bill, but we thought it best to clothe the President with the power of exercising the functions or the powers granted in this bill through such agency as he considers proper.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Together with the powers heretofore conferred on the Shipping Board by act of Congress?

Mr. HARDY. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. So, therefore, they are repealed.

Mr. HARDY. I think, in so far as this act contravenes the Shipping Board act, it repeals that act.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is the question to which I was trying to get a response.

Mr. HARDY. There is a clause in the shipping act which provides for fixing the rates by the Shipping Board. That would be repealed unless the Shipping Board gave authority under this——

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is the question.

Mr. HARDY. Let me say this, it would be suspended during the war, not repealed, because it is a war measure.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended for a minute in order to answer this question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Has the attention of this committee been called to the fact that the New York Board of Transportation has protested against the very large increase of rates on the Erie Canal, and has said that after that canal had been built at a very great expense by the State of New York that it would probably be put out of business by increases to so very high rates as to preclude business upon the canal?

Mr. HARDY. Let me make this statement to the gentleman. I have not had notice of what incident he speaks, but it has come to my hearing that there has been a proposition by the Director General of the Railroads to raise some water and rail rates together, in order to make them equal, where an all-rail rate comes in competition with water and rail. I should hate to see this act or any other act raise rates on water routes for the purpose of furnishing more business to our railways when they are as congested as they are now. That is a matter of practice, a matter of policy, that I think we must present, if there is any case like the gentleman speaks of, with our protest to the powers that be. I fully agree, if there has been an effort to raise the rates on the Erie Canal in order to throw more freight to the railways, that is wrong.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Does not the gentleman understand that one of the chief difficulties with water transportation in the past has been that where railroads have paralleled waterways they have made lower rates than they have elsewhere, and with the object and sole object of driving the waterway out of business?

Mr. HARDY. To which I am utterly opposed, and I hope the gentleman can help us remedy it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, at the time of the discussion of the act taking over the railroads the questions just presented by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] were also raised, and I pointed out to the House in the course of that discussion what would result if the control of rates was taken from the Interstate Commerce Commission and predicted exactly what is happening under the powers conferred by that act.

I said then, and I repeat it, that we have only one board of experts in this country that is competent to determine railroad rates, unless you take the railway experts themselves, who determine rates just as the railroads want to have them. That one board is the Interstate Commerce Commission. Now, what is happening to-day? Rates are being fixed that will absolutely ruin communities if they are put in force; will absolutely ruin certain kinds of business; will even put the Erie Canal out of operation. Although I do not know and I do not think any gentleman can refer me to any authority in the bill taking over the railroads to fix rates upon canals or rivers, it has been done in the name of the Director General. Where the Director General of the Railroads gets that authority is more than I can imagine. He can, of course, so arrange matters that no freight will be delivered to a canal boat or to a steamboat and thereby deprive them of traffic, but no authority has been given him to fix rates on waterways. Yet he seems to have fixed rates on the Erie Canal, and I might say in this connection that my information is, from the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY], that he has also ordered the rates raised on the Sacramento River to an amount equal to the railroad rates, whereas before they were only about half.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield in that connection?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I understand, as an illustration, that the rate on fire brick from New York City and New Jersey points to Buffalo has been raised from $1.50 to $3.60 per unit, which I think is a ton, more than double what the rate has been for a great many years. And the gentlemen who have received freight in that way tell me it will absolutely ruin and put them out of business.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I know of a number of similar instances. The rates are being fixed simply in the interest of the railways without consideration or with only slight consideration, at least, of the interests of the respective communities, the interests of the public in general, or the rights of the individuals.

Now, what is going to happen if the provisions of this bill are kept as they stand and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas is voted down? It will be even worse than what is happening under the bill taking over the railroads, because it will be all confusion under the terms of the bill. No one knows whether the act giving the Shipping Board authority is going to prevail, whether this act is going to prevail, or even to what vessels it applies. If I understand the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] correctly, it is not really intended that this bill shall apply to every canal boat that floats upon the waters of the United States. I may be wrong about that, but I am unable to determine from the bill positively whether it does or does not. I hardly think that was the intention of the committee.

I propose later on to offer an amendment which will define the class of vessels to which the act refers. It says now that they are "vessels of the United States," and some gentlemen sitting by my side say that would mean every boat floating on a river, canal, lake, or wherever it may be. As I understand it now, the Shipping Board has authority to regulate rates on the coastwise trade and on the Great Lakes, but not on the inland rivers. That authority probably belongs to the Interstate Commerce Commission as yet——

Mr. ALEXANDER. The Interstate Commerce Commission has no authority to regulate these rates. Where there is a rail and a water rate, making a joint through rate, they control that, but they have no right to regulate an independent rate.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman will, I hope, pardon me. He did not ask me to yield, but interrupted me before I finished my sentence. The gentleman is expressing the situation correctly. Now, if this bill applies to the rates on the inland waters it would conflict with the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission as it now stands, so far as it applies to the rates on inland waters in connection with the joint rate made by a railway and a steamboat line. It seems to me that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas ought to prevail. The reasons which he gave are most cogent. There is no way in which we can reach a decision made by the President in the same manner as we could a decision made by a board. An action of mandamus may be made against a board to compel it to apply a reasonable rate. It may be enjoined from applying an unreasonable rate.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman has given considerable study to this question. Is there any way to reach the rates promulgated by the Director General of Railroads recently?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That, of course, is a little foreign to the subject that I have in mind now, but the Interstate Commerce Commission can, under the railway control bill, review the rates established by the Director General.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But will they do so?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In effect, and in so far as the actual result is concerned, I think the power will amount to nothing.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is what I had in mind.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Now, if an error is made, how is it to be reached under that bill? If a wrong conclusion is reached upon these rates, what remedy is the shipper to have that would be adequate in any way? I insist, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] ought to prevail.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, there are a few things that I know about water transportation, and I have thought perhaps by relating some of them it might throw a little light on the subject. Where you speak of the rail and water transportation, that occurs only in a few places.

Now, I have been for 25 years vice president of the Lake Champlain Transportation Co. We would bring down iron ore by water from Lake Champlain to New York to go by rail into eastern Pennsylvania, and that would be a through rate. But there is a lot about this water transportation that should not be left to any one particular board. That is the reason why I think it would be a good thing to put it up to the President, so that he could appoint special boards for special interests.

Now, in the case of water transportation, take it in and around the city of New York and all the waterways leading to and from it; take the rate to New Haven, which is 75 miles from New York; the present rate on coal is about 75 cents a ton. The rate to Derby, which is only about 60 miles from New York, is about 85 or 90 cents a ton. The reason for the difference is that there is a little extra towage and not so much water. They have to go up there with 600 tons, whereas they can go up to New Haven with 1,200 tons.

The Shipping Board down at New York used to reach these water men. They assembled in the Produce Exchange and met the freighters, and then and there all questions were gone over—How much could a boat carry, and What was the cost to a certain point, and What was it to another point; and it was on all this information that the rates were finally named. So that it seems to me that the committee is right for this reason, that the Shipping Board may have plenty to do already in the things they are now managing, and the President might use some other agency in protecting, we will say, the kind of traffic I am talking about.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLEARY. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. The point I have in mind is not the creation of boards to carry out principally executive functions; but as to the rate-making power, it being a legislative power, does the gentleman think it well for Congress to delegate it to an agency in such a way that the courts would have absolutely no control or power to settle the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the rate?

Mr. CLEARY. The legal proposition I shall not attempt to discuss. That is the reason why the lawyers do most of the discussing of these legal propositions, becaue they are legal.

I know only of the physical conditions, and it is of those that I am speaking.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CLEARY. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. As I understand the gentleman's argument on the question he has just been speaking of, it is this: He does not say that it should be the President, but it should be some board other than this board, because he believes this board already has all it can do. He thinks that some other board can look into the evidence?

Mr. CLEARY. Yes. In water shipments there are a great many things to be considered. The depth of water, the cost of towing, and the kind of boats, all enter into the cost of transportation; the Champlain Canal and the Erie Canal enter into the matter.

And, speaking of the Erie Canal, I want to say that a great wrong has been done there because of lack of knowledge. In its palmy days I shipped millions of tons over the Erie Canal. I was the manager of two through transportation lines through most of my life, and the Erie Canal got its business because it carried more cheaply than the railroads. That is the reason.

But when you put the water rates up to the railroad rates the boats are going to Buffalo light. That situation has got to be remedied. Therefore the board appointed by the President should have special knowledge of that canal business. They should learn it, and they ought to learn it from the people who know. So it is with all your inland business. I do not think that some one particular power should attempt to govern all the seaboard rates and the ocean rates across and the sound rates and the Hudson River rates. There is too much of it. It ought to be confined to men who know what they are talking about and who know what they are doing, and then they will not destroy it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLEARY. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is aware of the fact that some board, or somebody appointed by the President, is putting the Erie Canal out of business at the present time?

Mr. CLEARY. They will learn in time. [Applause.]

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the pending bill relates to ships, I feel that it would not be out of place to mention a most advantageous arrangement recently effected by the Emergency Fleet Corporation in the location of one of its Pacific coast concrete-ship yards in Oakland Harbor, Cal. The Government thereby obtains without cost a 25-year lease on a site comprising nearly 100 acres fronting on deep water and valued at over $1,000,000. The land belongs primarily to the cities of Oakland and Alameda, with a possible undivided and undefined interest in the State of California. It lies in the heart of Oakland Harbor, between the cities of Oakland and Alameda, and constitutes an ideal location for Government purposes. Comment has more than once been made on the floor of this House upon the tremendous expenditures of the Government in the purchase of yards at Norfolk, Hog Island, and other localities. I have no criticism to make on this great outlay of money for necessary land purchases, as I assume that the Government officials acted honestly and paid no more than the fair market price. It is with some pride, however, that I refer to the generous action of the State of California and the cities of Oakland and Alameda in leasing to the Government for 25 years without cost a most valuable piece of water-front land. I believe also that commendatory mention should be made of Mr. R. J. Wig, chief of the concrete division of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, and of his associate, Mr. H. J. Brunnier, through whose efforts the lease was consummated. In closing I might say that recently the city of Alameda, with the cooperation of the Legislature of California, tendered to the United States Government without compensation the whole, or such part as may be needed, of a 3,000-acre tract of water-front land on San Francisco Bay for the proposed new naval base selected at Alameda by the Helm Naval Base Commission. This land is valued at many million dollars. [Applause.]

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, unquestionably this act confers very large powers upon the President; but the country is confronted with a situation which renders it absolutely necessary that these powers should be lodged in the Executive, or lodged elsewhere, if there is any other functionary or tribunal in which it is considered that they should be more appropriately lodged. Of course whenever large powers are granted it is always possible that these powers may be abused. The purpose of this bill is to enable the United States to control the ocean-going and other rates which have heretofore, in many instances, mounted to such extravagant heights that they have been simple robbery. Because we propose to create the authority by which these abuses may be rectified, it is suggested that the President, in the exercise of the powers that we confer upon him, may take rates which at present are fair, just and equitable, and enlarge them to inequitable and unjust proportions, to the prejudice of the public interests. Well, that is a possibility. I admit that under the powers given, he can do that very thing. But does anyone conceive that it is likely that the President will pursue such a course in lieu of rectifying the rates which at present are in so many instances outrageous and oppressive. Power is given to correct, not to create abuses, and it is to be presumed that this power will be exercised to consummate the legislative intent.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes, I yield.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would not want to be put in the position myself to which the gentleman refers. The idea that I had was simply that the President might not be infallible.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Oh, he is not.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Not being an expert on rates.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. He is not.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And that mistakes might be made.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. They may.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And for that reason, that the courts ought to have some chance to rectify those mistakes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The courts are not infallible. Some of the greatest mistakes that I have ever observed have been committed by the courts.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. So far as boosting the rates is concerned, no one would dream that the President would put the rates higher than they are now, but they might be made inequitable as between different shippers and different communities.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Oh, they may. You can not lodge in the President, or in the Interstate Commerce Commission, or in any other tribunal, the power to do large things, without affording the opportunity for the abuse of this power.

Mr. DEMPSEY. As I understand the gentleman's argument, it is that freight rates should be controlled so as to be made reasonable?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is what I think should be done.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I do not understand that the gentleman has addressed himself at all to this question, which is the question before the House, whether it would not be better to lodge those powers to reduce rates to reasonable sums in the Shipping Board rather than in the Executive.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I simply have not reached that proposition. I propose to discuss it. The gentleman from New York who has preceded me has pointed out very sufficient reasons why the powers conferred upon the President should not in their entirety be committed to any one tribunal, or any one agency, but should be exercised through a number of appropriate agencies or tribunals. Section 2 of this bill provides that the President may exercise the power and authority vested in him through such agency, or agencies as he shall determine from time to time.

With respect to rate matters I take it for granted that in the exercise of a wise discretion he will avail himself largely of the Shipping Board. If we do not believe that he will exercise his discretion wisely then we ought not to confer upon him the powers proposed. That is clear.

Mr. DEMPSEY. With respect to certain powers heretofore conferred on the Shipping Board, the suggestion has been made that by this act we have given the President the power to override that action of the Shipping Board.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes, that is true.

Mr. HARDY. During the war.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes, during the war, or a national emergency

Mr. DEMPSEY. If it is the intention of the act to confer the real power on the Shipping Board, and that the President shall simply be nominally in control of it, why not say what we intend to do, to name the Shipping Board?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. But the President will be in real control of the Shipping Board.

I was proceeding to say that, with respect to certain phases of this rate problem, the President will naturally exercise the powers conferred through one agency, and with respect to certain other phases of the same problem will exercise these powers through some other and more appropriate functionary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. In large measure I take it that the question of rates will be dealt with by the President through the Shipping Board. But we do not propose to limit his powers in that respect. Something may arise in connection with general rates, or with some particular rates, or with some particular line of transportation, or with some particular collection of ships, which the President may prefer to deal with through some agency other than the Shipping Board. He is given the power to do that. It has been pointed out by the gentleman from New York that it is well that he should have this power. If this committee thinks that it is unwise that this power should be conferred, on the ground that it is susceptible of abuse, or that if given it is likely to be exercised in contravention of the public interest, then this grant of power should be denied and this bill defeated. It has been pointed out that all large grants of power are susceptible of great abuses. But this possibility of abuse should not lead us to the conclusion that on this account large powers should never be conferred. If with respect to one of the instances cited, it is considered that the powers conferred would be most efficiently exercised through the Shipping Board, it may be presumed that in that particular respect the President will make use of the Shipping Board. But at the same time if there are other situations that can be more properly dealt with through other agencies, we ought not to cripple the power of the President to establish and make use of those agencies.

That is the situation which confronts us. The powers given are large. The committee does not shrink from the acknowledgement of that fact or of the further fact that the possibility of abuse is great. But I never have been able to see how you can give large powers of discretion, and then so hedge about, curtail, and limit these powers so given as to remove the possibility of abuse. It can not be done. So long as any power of discretion remains, the possibility of abusing that discretion is co-existent. So far as the Shipping Board is concerned, that board is the creation of the President. The board is composed of his appointees. Why is it to be presumed that these appointees will exercise these powers more wisely and more effectually than the President will exercise the powers conferred upon him?

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. The difference I make is this: If an unreasonable rate should be put into effect the difference would be that the courts of the country would have no power of review if put in effect by a proclamation of the President. But if put into effect by the board, that board would be subject to review by the court.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I do not know that I agree with the gentleman. With respect to the powers of the President that belong to him by virtue of the Constitution it may be admitted that the courts could not enjoin him from the exercise of those powers, but I do not by any means concede the proposition that when by legislative enactment authority is given to the President to do certain things he is thereby clothed with a sanctity that will protect acts improperly done in the alleged exercise of this authority from the lawful jurisdiction and authority of the Federal courts. I do not admit that contention.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I understood the committee assented to the amendment which I proposed in line 14, page 3, section 6, to strike out the words "or claim" and insert before the word "collect" the word "or."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 14, strike out the words "or claim" and before the word "collect" insert the word "or," so that it will read: "it shall be unlawful to charge or collect any compensation," etc.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That the President shall have power to requisition for military purposes, or for any other national purpose connected with or arising out of the present war, the temporary possession of any vessel, or, without taking actual possession, to requisition the services of any vessel and to require the person entitled to the possession thereof to issue to the master such instructions as may be necessary to place the vessel at the service of the United States.

Upon requisitioning such possession or services, or as soon thereafter as the exigencies of the situation may permit, the President shall transmit to the person entitled to the possession of such vessel a charter setting forth the terms which, in his judgment, should govern the relations between the United States and such person and a statement of the rental or rate of hire which, in his judgment, will be just compensation for such vessel and for the services required under the terms of such charter. If such person does not execute and deliver such charter and accept such rental or rate of hire, the President shall pay to such person a sum equal to 75 per cent of such rental or rate of hire as the same may from time to time be due under the terms of the charter, and such person shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as added to such 75 per cent will make up such amount as will be a just and reasonable rental or rate of hire for the use of the vessel and for the services required under the terms of such charter. In the event of loss of or damage to such vessel, due to the operation of a risk assumed by the United States under the terms of such charter (in the event that no valuation of such vessel or mode of compensation has been agreed to), the United States shall pay just compensation for such loss or damage, to be determined by the President; and if the amount so determined is not satisfactory to the person entitled to receive just compensation, the President shall pay to such person 75 per cent of the amount so determined, and such person shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as added to such 75 per cent will make up such amount as will be just compensation.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, on page 6, line 18, after the first word "for," I move to amend by inserting the words "the use of," so it will read "just compensation for the use of."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 18, after the word "for," insert the words "the use of."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALEXANDER. On page 7, lines 2 and 3, I move to strike out "just and reasonable rental or rate of hire" and insert the words "just compensation," and in line 4 strike out the words "under the terms of such charter."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 2, strike out the words "just and reasonable rental or rate of hire" and insert in lief thereof the words "just compensation." In line 4, page 7, strike out the words "under the terms of said charter," so that the lines as amended will read: "such further sum as added to such 75 per cent will make up such amount as will be a just compensation for the use of the vessel and for the services required."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That the President shall have power to prescribe the priority in which the persons in possession of dry docks, wharves, or loading or discharging terminal facilities, in any port of the United States, or warehouse equipment or terminal railways connected therewith, shall serve vessels and shippers, and to make any rules and regulations with respect to the conduct of the business thereof which may in his judgment be necessary and proper.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, strike out all of section 12 and insert the following:

"SEC. 12. That the President shall have power to prescribe the order of priority in which persons in possession of dry docks, wharves, lighterage systems or loading or discharging terminal facilities, in any port of the United States, or warehouse equipment or terminal railways connected therewith, shall serve vessels and shippers and to determine, prescribe, and enforce the rates, terms, and conditions charged or required for the furnishing of such services, including stevedoring and handling of cargo, and the handling, dispatching, and bunkering of vessels, and to make such rules and regulations with respect to the conduct of any such business as may be necessary and proper. It shall be unlawful to charge, collect, or claim any compensation or enforce or attempt to enforce any terms or conditions or to make or receive any payment or do any act with respect to any such service not in accordance with the rates, terms, and conditions so prescribed, anything in any contract, whether heretofore or hereafter made, to the contrary notwithstanding."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That the President shall have power to acquire by purchase or lease, or to requisition the title to or temporary possession of, or to assume temporary control of, any dry docks, wharves, or loading or discharging terminal facilities, in any port of the United States, or warehouse equipment or terminal railways connected therewith.

Whenever the President requisitions or assumes control of any such property, the United States shall pay just compensation therefor, to be determined by the President. If the amount so determined is not satisfactory to the person entitled to receive just compensation, the President shall pay to such person 75 per cent of the amount so determined and such person shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as added to such 75 per cent will make up such amount as will be just compensation.

Whenever the President acquires by purchase, lease, or requisition, or assumes control of any such property immediate possession may be taken thereof to the extent of the interest acquired therein, and such property may be immediately occupied and used without regard to the provisions of section 355 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, lines 5 and 6, strike out the word "warehouse" and insert the word "warehouses," and insert a comma thereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever the President acquires by purchase, lease, or requisition, or assumes control of any such property immediate possession may be taken thereof to the extent of the interest acquired therein, and such property may be immediately occupied and used without regard to the provisions of section 355 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, after line 23, insert a new paragraph as follows:
"Nothing in this section shall authorize the President to requisition the title to any such property owned by any State, municipality, or subdivision thereof."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I will say in explanation that there are municipalities that own their warehouses and terminal facilities, such as Seattle and Philadelphia, and I simply explain that we are not conferring the power to take over and condemn permanently these warehouses and other facilities.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That all vessels of which the possession or services are requisitioned under this act, and all dry docks, wharves, loading or discharging terminal facilities, warehouse equipment, or terminal railways, of which the President may acquire the title or possession or of which he may assume control under this act, may be operated and managed as the President may from time to time direct. The net proceeds derived from any activity authorized in this act or the joint resolution of May 12, 1917 (Public No. 2), or the division entitled "Emergency shipping fund" of the act of June 15, 1917 (Public No. 23), shall be deposited in the Treasury in a separate and distinct fund and may be expended by the President in carrying out the purposes of this act, and within the limits of the amounts heretofore or hereafter authorized, for the construction, requisitioning, or purchasing of vessels.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, lines 6 and 7, strike out the word "warehouse" and insert in lieu thereof the word "warehouses," and insert a comma thereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 21, after the word "vessels," insert the following:
"Provided, That none of the provisions of this act shall apply to vessels of less than 500 tons burden plying exclusively on the inland waterways and rivers of the United States."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of that amendment is to exclude the operations of this bill from the craft that operate on the rivers and canals, of course, but especially on the rivers of the interior of the country—the Monongahela, the Ohio, and the Allegheny.

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to exempt from the provisions of this act the boats and craft that navigate the rivers of the United States in the interior of the country and the canals. I have the honor to represent on this floor the twenty-second district of Pennsylvania, composed of the counties of Westmoreland and Butler. Through and adjoining Westmoreland County flow the Monongahela and Allegheny Rivers, which are navigable and which, at their juncture at Pittsburgh, form the Ohio, and the Youghiogheny, which is navigable in part. On these rivers there are great commerce lines and passenger boats plying regularly between the cities and towns along these rivers, and towboats—peculiarly constructed craft used on the western rivers which push boats ahead of them laden with coal, iron, glass, and general freight.

The purpose of this bill is to requisition and take over boats that can be used in carrying troops and supplies to our armies in Europe. These boats will never be used for this purpose, hence the restrictions of this act requiring licenses, the filing of the contracts under which they operate, and various restrictions that will be imposed on ocean-going and coastwise traffic should not be enforced against these boats.

It would be a great inconvenience and interference with the operation of these boats on the rivers named if they were compelled to get all of their freight tariffs and charges, requisitions, and other permits from Washington City. Therefore I urge the passage of this amendment, so that they may be exempted and permitted to continue in the commerce in which they are engaged in and around the city of Pittsburgh, and the rivers tributary thereto, unrestricted and free as heretofore.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill. Stringent, far-reaching and arbitrary as its provisions are, it is aimed at the profiteering on the seacoast by owners of vessels, whether individuals or corporations, that they have large freight craft, and which is levied not only on the Federal Government but on all business enterprises seeking and requiring ocean transportation.

I am in favor of every move that will assist the President and our Government in the transportation of troops, equipment, and supplies to Europe and in the prompt return of our sick and wounded soldiers to their native land.

Mr. Chairman, we are building rapidly an immense ocean tonnage. During the month of May 71 ocean-going steamers of various sizes were launched. Scarcely a day passes that there does not glide from ways into the sea a new ship from some of the many shipyards on the Pacific or Atlantic coast. If the war lasts another year, the United States will have at least 8,000,000 tons of shipping afloat more than we have now. We will, in fact, own and control one-third of the entire ocean-going traffic of the world by the end of 1919. This splendid accomplishment of American energy and American industry, now engaged in the construction of ships, must be protected and encouraged in every way if Congress can protect and encourage it. There was a time, gentlemen of the House, when the American ships sailed every sea, when the Stars and Stripes floated to the breeze in every port. In those days the commerce of the United States was carried in American bottoms, upon ships commanded by American officers, manned by American seamen. That day, alas, was prior to the Civil War; but after the close of the war our shipping went rapidly into decline and at the outbreak of the present war our merchant-marine fleet was by far the least of the great commercial nations. We were paying hundreds of millions of dollars a year to foreign shipowners for the transportation of American goods which should have been paid to American shipowners to maintain and support our own ships, flying our own flag. The prime purpose of this act of Congress is to take over all shipping and to control foreign shipping in all American ports.

The prejudice against ship subsidies has largely disappeared. We are going further now than any subsidy ever went. Our Government is not only building and operating its own yards, but owns and has requisitioned and operates practically all the ships that sail the seas outside of those of our allies. This policy is bringing into existence rapidly and with increasing speed a splendid merchant marine, sailing the American flag and manned and officered by American seamen.

Believing as I do, that this bill will encourage this great fleet to carry our vast commerce during the war and to carry commerce of every other nation when the war is over, I am willing to support this bill. The President has written a letter asking its passage, and I am supporting the President and supporting my country when I support this bill. After the war is over and these ships are released from carrying the grim freight of war and have returned our victorious troops to their native land, under the beneficent clauses of this bill, which will remain in force for six months after the war is over, the true mission of our merchant marine will become apparent not only to our American people but to the nations of the world, and that mission, Mr. Chairman, is the complete commercial dominion of the high seas. Then again will the American flag be seen upon all of the seas, and then again will American commerce have its ancient and right place at the front and head of all the commercial nations of the world. This is our destiny and this is the purpose of this act of Congress that we will this day place upon the statute books of our National Legislature.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will say this to save time. What we have in view is to control the rates that are necessary in our foreign trade to get our soldiers and our supplies and our munitions to Europe to fight and win this war——

Mr. ROBBINS. I am in hearty sympathy with that.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And I can not imagine the people of the Ohio River are any less patriotic than anyone else——

Mr. ROBBINS. They are just as patriotic.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And if anybody should undertake to profiteer there I can not imagine they would want to protect them——

Mr. ROBBINS. We do not.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not care to waste further time. If the gentleman wants them exempted, all right.

Mr. ROBBINS. All right, then. I will not talk about it further, if it is agreed to.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment in accordance with the request of the chairman of the committee. Will the Clerk please report it as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ROBBINS moves to modify his amendment by striking out the word "waterways," so that the amendment will read:

"Provided, That none of the provisions of this act shall apply to vessels of less than 500 tons burden plying exclusively on the inland rivers and canals of the United States."

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Speaker, just a word. Does not the gentleman think he ought to cut out the tonnage and say "freight carried on rivers and canals?" Because some boats carry a little more, and a fellow would not like to come down light and carry 500 tons if he can carry 600 tons.

Mr. DEMPSEY. If it is to be amended, it should be a thousand tons, because the barge canal carries 900 tons.

Mr. CLEARY. But you do not need to go into that. Cut the tonnage out.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modification.

The Clerk read as follows:

Further modification, striking out the words "of less than 500 tons burden," so that the amendment as modified will read:

"Provided, That none of the provisions of this act shall apply to vessels plying exclusively on the inland rivers and canals of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That if any provision of this act, or the application of such provision to certain circumstances, is held unconstitutional, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision to circumstances other than those as to which it is held unconstitutional, shall not be affected thereby.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROBBINS: Page 10, line 8, after the word "thereby," strike out the period and insert the following:

"Provided, That the President shall make report in writing to Congress on the first Monday of December each year of all action taken under the provisions of this act."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against that.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is quite apparent from the reading of it. It is simply to give Congress on the first Monday of December each year a report from the President of what is done under this act. This act is a very drastic one, as has been stated by all of the gentlemen who argued it. It is arbitrary in its power, extensive in its provisions, and most inclusive in its purpose. With the exception now of the canals and rivers, it includes all the waterways of the country and all the vessels of the country plying in coastwise and ocean traffic. Not only are the provisions of this act to be considered but all the rules and regulations that are to be made under it, and I think it would be very wise for the navigation interests of this country and the corporations operating steamships abroad and coastwise to know at the end of the year what the President has done by reason of this act. While it is true it is a war measure, and while it will expire by limitation when the war has been closed by the proclamation of the President, or six months thereafter, if the exigency exists for extending it, I contend it would be fair and right and proper to the vast shipping interests of this country to know what the President has done under this bill, because there ought to be some statement and publication of the rules and regulations made, of the number of people that have been punished, the way the law has worked out, its hardships, and its uses. And I therefore think this is a very reasonable requirement to place in this act, to ask the President, as we have done in many of these other measures, to make a report to Congress of what action he has taken under its provisions.

Now, we must remember that the provisions of this act will be carried out by the Emergency Shipping Board, or the Emergency Shipping Fleet Committee, a subcommittee of that board. It will be acting all over the country. They will have rates promulgated in San Francisco, New Orleans, Galveston, New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Norfolk, and other places, and it would be beneficial to the shipping interests of the United States to know what the President has done, and to have him, under the provisions of this bill, make a complete report on the first Monday of December of each year when Congress assembles, giving that information.

Therefore I ask the adoption of this amendment for that purpose.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I will not make any point of order against the amendment.

These powers will, no doubt, be exercised through the Shipping Board and the law provides that the Shipping Board shall make annual reports. Why we should create in that board a bureau to compile all these orders, rates, and statistics from time to time and make a report at the end of the year at the cost of possibly $50,000 or $100,000, that nobody will ever read, I can not understand.

Mr. ROBBINS. The gentleman will remember——

Mr. ALEXANDER. Just a moment. The Congress can call on the President at any time for any information in reference to the manner in which he is executing the powers conferred on him under the provisions of this act, and the shipping interests, which will be the interests directly affected, will have notice at any very time of any power that is exercised and that may affect them.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS My idea about the situation is this: The purpose of this motion, I want to say to the gentleman, is to put this Shipping Board, which is now made a rate-making power by this act, on the same basis exactly as the Interstate Commerce Commission to-day. It makes its report to Congress each year, and only to Congress, and it publishes these various rates that apply to railway transportation and they are posted in the offices of the transportation companies. They are not contained in the reports that the Interstate Commerce Commission makes. It is only a little volume. It reports what it has done. If you want anything investigated about it, you can take it up and call on it for the special information desired. I want the Shipping Board to be put on the same basis as the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has the rate-making power as to railroads, this Shipping Board being the rate-making power as to water transportation lines.

Mr. ALEXANDER. There is nothing in this bill about the rate making of the railroads. The President is operating the railroads, not the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. ROBBINS. What I want to show is what rates are made, what rules and regulations are promulgated, and what the traffic is under the provisions of this act.

Mr. ALEXANDER. They will be promulgated from time to time and made a matter of public record, and it would not serve any useful purpose in the world to embody them in a report to Congress. The Interstate Commerce Commission in their reports do not embody the rates that are in force. They are a part of the records of the Interstate Commerce Commission and open for inspection.

Mr. ROBBINS. The rates to be promulgated here should be set out in general information, not in detail. The rates on the coastwise traffic will be as numerous as the character of that traffic. The rates to foreign ports will be another character of rate making. Now, we will never get that information except in a report made by the President to Congress.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman want all the rates to be embodied in a report to be made to Congress?

Mr. ROBBINS. No. The reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission do not embrace all the rates on railroads, but we want to know the rates and rules and regulations on water transportation between certain points.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I doubt whether they will make any rates at all in the coastwise trade. This bill is intended to meet conditions in this war, and chiefly in the overseas trade. I think it is absolutely unnecessary to require the report called for by the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BURNETT). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS]. The Chair understood the point of order was withdrawn.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; it is withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Now, Mr. Chairman, we agreed that we might return to section 5 so that my colleague on the committee [Mr. WHITE of Maine] might offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the committee will return to section 5 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITE of Maine: Page 3, line 9, strike out the period and insert a colon and the following words: "Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to vessels of less than 500 tons dead-weight."

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to perfect that amendment by adding the words "carrying capacity," so that it will conclude "500 tons dead weight carrying capacity."

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is one of the sections of the bill with which I am not in complete accord. This section 5 aims to give the President the power to require that all charters of vessels shall be submitted to him and be approved by him before they can be lawfully entered into.

The section as it is drawn covers not only vessels engaged in the foreign trade, but vessels plying up and down our coast, on our lakes, and in our rivers. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that while that is the scope of the section as it reads, yet, as a matter of practice, it will be applied only to vessels engaged in our coastwise trade and operating on our interior waters. It was testified before the committee that so far as the foreign trade is concerned the Shipping Board to-day has requisitioned every vessel of over 2,500 tons capacity in the United States. It has the power under other sections of this bill to requisition any other vessels and the services of any vessels it or the President sees fit, so that there can be no question as to the chartering of vessels engaged in the foreign trade, because under existing law and under other provisions of this bill the Shipping Board has full authority and full control to manage and regulate that trade. So that, as I say, it will apply in practice only to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade and on our rivers and lakes. Now, we have in these trades a great many vessels of very small tonnage.

I do not have the figures for this year, but as of June 30, 1917, we had some 3,584 sailing vessels of less than 100 tons burden; we had some 3,022 steam vessels of less than 100 tons; and we had in addition to that some 13,000 gas vessels of less than that tonnage. In my opinion, these vessels are of no particular consequence in carrying on this war. They meet local needs, they are a local accommodation, and that is all they are.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we are all animated by a common sentiment; we are all aiming at a common object. We want to see the merchant marine of the United States revived. We all remember what we have read of the days of the roaring forties and the days of the fifties, when America was mistress of the seas. Then the Stars and Stripes were seen in every port of the world. The clipper ship then sailed from the Atlantic coast around the Horn to the Golden Gate. She carried our goods to the Indies and brought the tea of that remote section to the merchants of London. But in 1914, when this war broke out, our shipping had fallen to the lowest estate. With a commerce at that time of some four and one-half billion dollars a year, we carried in American ships less than 9 per cent of it. The fruit of our farms, the ore of our mines, the lumber of our forests, and the product of our factories were carried to the markets of the world in foreign bottoms, and America was in a position of commercial slavery.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BURNETT). The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent for one minute more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, that condition was brought about through many causes, by sins of omission and by sins of commission, and among those sins of commission were restrictive policies and interference with the American merchant marine. Let us not subject these small vessels to the vexations and delays incident to the administration of this section. I would have these small vessels left free to ply their trade. It is a small thing I am asking for these little vessels, and I hope that my amendment exempting them from the provisions of his section may have the approval of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, of course this amendment has never been considered by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and I am sure it would not meet the approval of the committee; and I question whether it will meet the approval of the gentleman himself if he will only reflect that a vessel of 500 tons burthen is a vessel that may be very useful to the Government in the prosecution of the war. If vessels of that class are exempted from the provisions of this bill, it will very seriously interfere with the power of the President so to coordinate our shipping as to provide transportation facilities for our troops and for supplies and munitions.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. This amendment does not seek to exempt these vessels from the bill, but only from section 5. There is still left with the President the power to requisition these vessels or to requisition the use of them at any time he sees fit. It simply exempts them from the necessity of submitting a charter to the President every time they want to move any freight from Kittery to Portsmouth, or from Boston to Providence, or some other little short voyage of that character. Every other provision of the bill is still applicable to them.

Mr. ALEXANDER. But the President should have the same power over the charters that he would have over the vessel if commandeered. It should not be the policy of the President to commandeer a vessel if the vessel under a charter can perform the same service. I would regret very much to have the power of the President limited in the manner suggested by the gentleman from Maine. As far as the vessels that traffic along the coast are concerned, I assume that the President, in the exercise of his power, will act with discretion and will not, under the power to designate the class of vessels and the trade or trades in which engaged, interfere with any legitimate local traffic; but I am sure this body does not wish to place any limitation on the power of the President, or any agency he may select, to utilize all our water craft, when and where necessary, for the successful prosecution of this war.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BURNETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12099) to confer on the President the power to prescribe charter rates and freight rates and to requisition vessels, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that those Members who have spoken on the bill may have five legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken on this bill may have five legislative days in which to extend remarks on the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS EXECUTIVE PAPERS.

Mr. TALBOTT, from the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, reported that the files and papers described in the report of the Secretary of the Interior in House Document No. 946, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session, dated February 15, 1918, and in the letter from the Department of Labor, dated March 14, 1918, are not needed in the transaction of the current business of such departments and bureaus and have no permanent value or historical interest.

EXCLUSION AND EXPULSION OF ANARCHISTS FROM THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 12402, to exclude and expel from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 12402. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON. Reserving the right to object, it does not seem to me that we ought to take up a bill at this time in the evening when there are very few Members present. I do not know anything about the bill.

Mr. BURNETT. I can explain the bill in a minute or two.

Mr. GILLETT. This is the bill for which the gentleman from Alabama has a rule, is it not?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; but I thought if we could get unanimous consent for its consideration it would obviate the necessity for having the rule.

Mr. GILLETT. I understood that the rule had come in and that we should act under the provisions of the rule. I think we had better have the rule.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 396 (H. Rept. No. 674).

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 12402, entitled "A bill to exclude and expel from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes"; that there shall be not to exceed one hour of general debate, to be divided between those supporting and those opposing the bill. At the conclusion of such general debate the bill shall be considered for amendments under the five-minute rule. After the bill shall have been perfected in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the same shall be reported to the House with such recommendation as the committee may make, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the rule.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman was simply going to present the rule and then let us adjourn and take it up to-morrow. There is nobody on the committee here, and I do not know whether they wish for any debate or not. I understand it was agreed that we should go forward without obstruction.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules. I have spoken with other members of the committee and there was no desire for time, as far as I know, by members of the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the rule.

The resolution was agreed to.

The House, under the rule, automatically resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HARDY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That aliens who are anarchists; aliens who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all forms of law; aliens who disbelieve in or are opposed to organized government; aliens who advocate or teach the assassination of public officials; aliens who advocate or teach the unlawful destruction of property; aliens who are members of or affiliated with any organization that entertains, teaches, or advocates the overthrow by force or violence, of the Government of the United States or of all forms of law, or that entertains or teaches disbelief in or opposition to organized government, or that advocates the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character, or that advocates or teaches the unlawful destruction of property, shall be excluded from admission into the United States.

SEC. 2. That any alien who, at any time after entering the United States, is found to have been at the time of entry, or to have become thereafter, a member of any one of the classes of aliens enumerated in section 1 of this act, shall, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor, be taken into custody and deported in the manner provided in the immigration act of February 5, 1917. The provisions of this section shall be applicable to the classes of aliens mentioned in this act irrespective of the time of their entry into the United States.

SEC. 3. That any alien who shall, after he has been excluded and deported or arrested and deported in pursuance of the provisions of this act, thereafter return to or enter the United States or attempt to return to or to enter the United States shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not more than five years; and shall, upon the termination of such imprisonment, be taken into custody, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor, and deported in the manner provided in the immigration act of February 5, 1917.

Mr. BURNETT (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARDY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12402 and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 21, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting draft of proposed bill, entitled "An act conferring jurisdiction on the district court of the Canal Zone for the naturalization of certain aliens (H. Doc. No. 1180); to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a list of judgments rendered against the Government by the district courts of the United States under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, as submitted by the Attorney General, which require an appropriation for their payment (H. Doc. No. 1181); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a list of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims, which have been presented to the Treasury Department and require an appropriation for their payment (H. Doc. No. 1182); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. TILLMAN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10432) to abolish the office of receiver of public moneys at Wausau, Wis., and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 672), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12512) to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department,' approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, and the same was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred, as follows:

By Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky: A bill (H. R. 12519) to provide for a more complete accounting of the financial operations of the government of the District of Columbia: to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. BRITTEN: A bill (H. R. 12520) to pay retired naval officers in accordance with the duty they are performing during the period of the war; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. RODENBERG: A bill (H. R. 12521) providing for the furnishing of uniforms, accouterments, and equipment, including watches, to officers of the military or naval forces of the United States, etc., at cost price; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. RANDALL: A bill (H. R. 12522) to require sworn statements to be filed with the Postmaster General showing the subscription price of publications of the second class; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 306) declaring that a state of war exists between the United States and the Governments of Bulgaria and Turkey; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

By Mr. CRAMTON: A bill (H. R. 12524) granting an increase of pension to Angeline McVetie; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DENT: A bill (H. R. 12525) for the relief of Frank Barber; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. FIELDS: A bill (H. R. 12526) granting an increase of pension to Columbus Hull; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SCOTT of Iowa: A bill (H. R. 12527) granting a pension to Caroline Tozier; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SELLS: A bill (H. R. 12528) granting a pension to Harry Noell; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHERWOOD: A bill (H. R. 12529) granting an increase of pension to Henry Rasenbranck; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SIMS: A bill (H. R. 12530) granting a pension to Harold W. Burch; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SLOAN: A bill (H. R. 12531) granting an increase of pension to Josiah H. Harp; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TILLMAN: A bill (H. R. 12532) for the relief of Andrew J. Gouge; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. BROWNING: Petition of citizens of Auburn, N. J., urging Nation-wide prohibition during the period of the war; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee: Papers to accompany H. R. 12513, granting an increase of pension to Henry S. Robert; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HAYDEN: Petition of Tucson Business Women's Association favoring the repeal of the zone system of second-class postal rates for the advertising sections of magazines; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. KINKAID: Petitions of citizens of Burwell and of Kearney, Nebr., asking for the repeal of the postal-zone law; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MAGEE: Petition of P. A. Norton, Homer, N. Y., favoring war prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SNYDER: Petitions of the Philathea and Baraca Classes of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Bartlett, N. Y.; the Men's Club and the Philathea Class of the South Street Methodist Episcopal Church, Utica; and various residents of Verona, N. Y., for war prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of residents of Oriskany Falls, N. Y., for immediate enactment of a national prohibition measure; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 21, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. George Kent, of New Orleans, La., offered the following prayer:

God and Father of us all, in the sacred and inspiring sense of being not alone Thy children but partners with Thee in the greatest and noblest achievements of our earth, oh, with what courage and devotion would we give ourselves to Thy service, with what sincerity and fidelity would we consecrate ourselves and our country to the highest good. In that sacred sense of being born of Thy spirit, one with Thee, all fidelity of ours shall be a joy, and something of that wisdom, that insight, of Thine shall be in us, giving us courage and hope to serve Thee and our fellows to the uttermost, and in this consecration, our Father, in this devotion to Thee as Thy sons, of loyalty to our fellow men as their brothers, we offer to Thee at this hour our faithful thought, our truest consecration, our devoted service. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an article from the Post of yesterday on the military record of Gen. Barnett, United States Marine Corps.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an article from the Washington Post of yesterday about Gen. Barnett. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the pending census legislation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on census legislation. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2104. An act to amend sections 4402, 4404, and 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States;

S. 4687. An act to amend further an act entitled "An act to authorize condemnation of lands for the generation and transmission of electric power";

S. 947. An act validating certain homestead entries; and

S. 130. An act to create in the War Department and the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as the "Civil War volunteer officers' retired list," to authorize placing thereon with retired pay certain surviving officers who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the Civil War, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the conference report, had further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 10069) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, had requested a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. RANSDELL, and Mr. NELSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 8563. An act to amend the homestead law in its application to Alaska, and for other purposes;

H. R. 10297. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their locomotives with safe and suitable boilers and appurtenances thereto," approved February 17, 1911; and

H. J. Res. 255. Joint resolution authorizing the readmission to the United States of certain aliens who have been conscripted or have volunteered for service with the military forces of the United States or cobelligerent forces.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 2104. An act to amend sections 4402, 4404, and 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

S. 947. An act validating certain homestead entries; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 4687. An act to authorize condemnation of lands for the generation and transmission of electric power; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXCLUSION AND EXPULSION OF ANARCHISTS FROM THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12402. The Chair has appointed the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] to preside; but he does not seem to be here, so the Chair will appoint the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] to preside temporarily until the gentleman from Texas arrives.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12402) with Mr. LONDON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12402, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12402) to exclude and expel from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the resolution general debate is limited to one hour, half to be controlled by either side.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I know of no one who is opposed to the bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] have one half of the time and that I may have the other half. I do that in the absence of the ranking minority Member [Mr. HAYES], who, I understand, is not here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the time allotted for general debate be equally divided between the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] and himself. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, this bill is a very simple one, and I think is self-explanatory. Under section 19 of the existing immigration law anarchists who have been in the United States more than five years are not subject to expulsion. The main purpose of this bill is to remedy that defect in the present law. There is also a section of the bill which provides that those expelled under this act who return shall be guilty of a felony and are subject to imprisonment as such. This bill is very much desired by several of the departments. It was prepared by the cooperation of the Department of Labor and the Department of Justice. We had full hearings before our committee, which were executive. Representatives of the Intelligence Bureaus of the War and Navy Departments appeared before the committee and the statements that they made and those which were made by representatives of the Departments of Justice and of Labor, who also appeared, showed that there was a very urgent necessity for the immediate passage of this bill.

It was shown that many anarchists who have been here for more than five years could not be expelled and were giving much trouble. They throw themselves back and say, "I am not subject to expulsion because I have been here for a period of more than five years," and the main purpose of the bill is to remedy that and also to impose a very severe penalty upon those who do return after expulsion under the law. Then, while we were at that it was thought by the Department of Justice and the Department of Labor that there ought to be some clarification of the law as it now exists in regard to the designation of anarchists. Section 3 of the present law provides that certain classes of aliens shall be excluded from admission to the United States and goes on to name them. I have the act before me, passed February 5, 1917. It was the act passed over the President's veto, and in that act enumerating the classes of aliens who should be excluded from the United States are "anarchists, or persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all forms of law; or who disbelieve in or are opposed to organized Government; or who advocate the assassination of public officials; or who advocate or teach the unlawful destruction of property." It has been contended very earnestly that the words following the word "anarchists" in the connection mentioned above are merely descriptive of that word, and that it takes these other terms to complete the definition. While that contention, we think, is exceedingly technical, and it is not conceded either by the Department of Justice or by the Department of Labor, or by our committee, it was thought that while we were bringing about the main purpose of the bill we had better clarify that by a change of punctuation and a rearrangement of the classes which were to be excluded. By section 19 of the present law it is provided:

> That at any time within five years after entry any alien who at the time of entry was a member of one or more of the classes excluded by law; any alien who shall have entered or who shall be found in the United States in violation of this act, or in violation of any other law of the United States * * * shall be excluded.

The five-year limitation applies to those that are in the categorical designation of anarchists. Then the others, "Any alien who at any time after entry shall be found advocating or teaching the unlawful destruction of property or advocating or teaching anarchy or the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all forms of law or the assassination of public officials," follow under the class that may be deported at any time after entry.

The contention has been made, and it is a rather serious one, that anarchists being named as a separate class, as contended for by the Department of Labor and the Department of Justice, and also, as I understood it when the act was passed, that the five years' limitation will apply to anarchists generally, but as to those who are going about advocating and teaching the destruction of property, and so forth, there is no time limit. Hence, in order to get that clear in the definition of anarchists and those embraced in the class of anarchists, the change in phraseology, punctuation, and arrangement is made in the first section.

Mr. Chairman, it is exceedingly important that the bill should be passed speedily, and in order to expedite the passage of it I went before the Senate Committee on Immigration a few days ago, where a similar bill was pending, and asked them to report that bill as soon as they could. The suggestion was made and agreed to by that committee that as soon as the House passed this bill the chairman of the Senate committee should report the bill out. Two slight amendments were suggested in the Senate committee, which, so far as I am concerned, are satisfactory. One of those amendments is by adding, on line 6 of the bill, after the words "aliens who disbelieve in or are opposed to," the word "all," and in line 1 page 2, the language quoted is found, and the word "all" should be added in the same way.

It was suggested that a man that believed in overthrowing or destroying the Kaiser, a man that was in Hungary and rebelled against the system of government that there prevailed, possibly might be excluded under this bill, but that if we said all "organized governments" it would be cleared up. Therefore it was thought that in order to make it clear as to what was really intended by Congress in the act of February 19, 1917, the amendment suggested by the Senate committee should be made here and thus save the delay of amending it in the Senate and sending it back to the House for concurrence. So at the proper place, in order to expedite it in the Senate, I shall offer those two amendments.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. ROGERS. I am heartily in favor of the purpose of this bill, of course. I want to ask a question for information concerning section 3. That provides that an alien who shall have been once deported and shall thereafter attempt to return shall be deemed guilty of a felony and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment, and so forth, and shall at the expiration of his term of imprisonment be deported. I wondered if there might not be cases where it would be desirable for the Secretary of Labor to have authority to deport at once without subjecting him to the absolute necessity of having this man tried for a felony? It seems to me the quicker you can get rid of cattle of this kind the better, and as the law now stands there must be first the trial and conviction and imprisonment, and only then at the conclusion of the imprisonment the deportation.

Mr. GORDON. Would you propose to try him at all?

Mr. ROGERS. Let the gentleman from Alabama answer.

Mr. BURNETT. I see the force of the suggestion of the gentleman, which is that the deportation is summary; and that was one of the very reasons we reported the first section of this bill, in order to clarify those questions and not leave them to adjudication by long trials in the court. If the question was raised, and the Department of Labor should overrule the point, the man still has his right to go into the courts with his habeas corpus. The gentleman and everyone else sees the purpose of the bill, which is that the department may have a summary means of getting rid of these people without the long delays of the court. The suggestion of the gentleman is that when he returns the same proceeding as to deportation should be taken without the delay of indictment, trial, and conviction by the courts.

Mr. ROGERS. Not that they should be, but in certain cases, in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, they might be.

Mr. BURNETT. I do not know that there would be any serious objection to the suggestion of the gentleman. This was the idea, however, that the man that came back after he had been deported had better be put into a prison, because if you deport him again maybe next week he will return, and so on ad infinitum; and if he should return, under this bill he could at once be tried and convicted of felony and imprisoned, and at the end of the term of imprisonment be deported.

Mr. ROGERS. If the gentleman will permit, it seems to me that in ninety-five cases out of a hundred the procedure suggested by the bill will be a sound and correct one, but it seems to me in the other five cases it may be exceedingly important to get rid of these people at once and not insist that they be subjected to trial, as the bill now requires.

Mr. BURNETT. In reaching the bill under the five-minute rule, I will give very careful consideration to the suggestion.

Mr. DOWELL. As I understand it, under the first section of the bill it is not intended that there shall be a trial. The department shall deport him without any form of trial?

Mr. BURNETT. Just as they do now.

Mr. DOWELL. And it is not necessary to have any evidence except the fact that the department determines that he belongs to the class specified in section 1?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Then the only opportunity for a trial he would have would be upon his return? Upon the question of imprisonment he then comes before the court to be tried as to whether or not he was actually deported and returned to the United States?

Mr. BURNETT. So far as a jury trial is concerned, but it has been the law for years and years to deport without any trial. An alien has not the right of trial by jury on the question of deportation. Any time he becomes offensive to our country we have the right to get rid of him. And therefore the summary remedy has prevailed for years. A man has a right to his day in court, because he can go by habeas corpus into the court and have his remedy there.

Mr. DOWELL. He will not remain here very long if he comes under this provision, but what I wanted to get at was what the committee intended by the provision of the bill.

Mr. BURNETT. When the evidence is produced to the Department of Labor or under their authority——

Mr. DOWELL. It shall be under such provisions as the department may prescribe as to the furnishing of the testimony——

Mr. BURNETT. Just as the law now is and has been all the time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The chairman of the committee will note that on line 3 is the language, "aliens who are anarchists." Does the chairman of the committee know whether or not there has been any Federal adjudication or correct definition of what is intended to be conveyed by the word "anarchist"?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I recall in the debate here on a similar question the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] took the position that an anarchist in proper contemplation was not necessarily one who believed in violence, but one who subscribed to certain philosophic doctrines as to government.

Mr. BURNETT. In the case of Turner against Williams, in One hundred and ninety-fourth United States, page 293, one of the deportation cases, as I recollect, they laid down this definition:

Anarchy 1. Properly one who advocates anarchy or the absence of government as a political ideal; a believer in an anarchic theory of society. In popular use one who seeks to overturn by violence all constituted forms and institutions of society and government, all law and order, and all rights of property, with no purpose of establishing any other system of order in the place of that destroyed, especially, such person when actuated by lust or plunder.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is the legal definition given of anarchists?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Your statute proposes to cover people who subscribe to things of that kind?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose that upon satisfactory evidence, without a hearing, a man is deported, as he alleges, wrongfully, notwithstanding the proposed legislation, could he appeal to the court on a writ of habeas corpus?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes. This does not deprive him of that right. He has that right now. That has been done under the existing law. It makes no change in that respect whatever.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I will say to the gentleman that I am very much in favor of the terms of this bill, but I was going to ask the Chairman if there is any general law now which enables the Government to handle men who entertain the views that are specified in this bill who are not foreigners or aliens?

Mr. BURNETT. Well, merely entertaining a view would not be a violation of that law or this, provided there was not some manifestation of it. My recollection is that under our late espionage law anyone, native or alien, who expresses sentiments of that kind is liable, on conviction, to a maximum sentence of 20 years. But this bill is not intended to reach anyone except aliens, and that by summary deportation. We could not make it apply to citizens.

Mr. DENISON. In other words, under the espionage law a man has to express the views in order to be amenable to the espionage law?

Mr. BURNETT. He might not do it in words, but by other manifestations, acts, or conduct.

Mr. GORDON. By signs?

Mr. BURNETT. By signs or symbols or some other means of expression. He must express it in some way. Merely thinking it would not make him amenable to the espionage law.

Mr. DENISON. Do I understand, then, I will ask the chairman, that a man can be deported under the terms of this bill, an alien, who does not express the views, but simply entertains them?

Mr. BURNETT. How would you get the evidence without some manifestation or expression of his views?

Mr. DENISON. That is what I am asking the chairman.

Mr. BURNETT. You could not prove it if a man keeps it in his breast and heart. You could not get the proof of it. But if there is any kind of manifestation, either by overt declaration or other expression, under this bill you could. The philosophic anarchist, as long as he keeps it in his own bosom, could not be made subject to this law. But they have cases of this kind: A man will say, "Yes; I am an anarchist; I believe in the principles of anarchy, but I would not kill the President; I would not murder an official; I would not destroy property." But when he goes around saying that he is an anarchist and that he believes in such violence he is having as much bad influence perhaps on others as those who advise the commission of overt acts.

Mr. DENISON. Then, as I understand it, if an alien could be deported under this bill, he could also be prosecuted under the provisions of the espionage act?

Mr. BURNETT. I understand so, but I am not familiar with all the details of that act. It did not come from my committee. A citizen would come under it, and an alien, too. There is no limitation to citizens in the act.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. So far as the imprisonment of a man on his return is concerned, it is not a question of bringing him into court to prove that he is an anarchist, because that has all been demonstrated in the first case. But it is punishment for returning?

Mr. BURNETT. It is not going de novo into the question of his being an anarchist; no.

Mr. MEEKER. It is merely a punishment, as in a case where we give a man so many days to get out of town?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. I understand that the gentleman has given a definition of anarchy, as rendered in the Turner case.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes. It is in the One hundred and ninety-fourth United States.

Mr. LONDON. I am under the impression that in the Turner case it was held that an alien was not entitled to a writ of habeas corpus if the Secretary of Labor determined that he was a nondesirable alien. That case was decided some 10 years ago. That is my impression, that the determination of the Secretary of Labor is final in these matters. Was not that the decision?

Mr. BURNETT. In other words, he is made the judge of the facts upon questions of fact, and they will not review the question of fact only so far as to say whether the facts justified the decision and that the law on which the decision was based is constitutional.

Mr. LONDON. The meaning of the phrase which is found in section 2, on page 2, of this bill is that any alien who is found by the Secretary of Labor to have been at the time of entry or thereafter a member of any one of the classes of aliens enumerated in the first section, or by somebody acting on behalf of the Secretary of Labor——

Mr. BURNETT. At the time of entry under the present law. This law modifies that, so that when he says, "No; I was not an anarchist when I entered, and therefore there can be no deportation under the present law, but now I have become an anarchist and I believe in the doctrines of anarchy," this bill will cover his case.

Mr. LONDON. Does not the gentleman believe that in view of the excited state of mind that exists in time of war that unclean interests may victimize innocent people and accuse them of being anarchists in the sense that this law uses the term "anarchist," and that there should be some protection to the person innocently accused—that he should have an opportunity for a trial? Because, after all, it is a very serious thing to be charged with the offenses covered by this bill. I concede that a man who believes in the overthrow of society by violence puts himself beyond the pale of civilized society. There can be no question about it. He is a revolutionist. He is a rebel against society, and he should be ready to pay the rebel's price, which is annihilation in case of failure.

Mr. GORDON. But you think he ought to be tried and found guilty first?

Mr. LONDON. But I think he should be given a chance, that he should have a fair trial, particularly in view of the fact that under war conditions, under abnormal conditions such as we have now, an employer of labor——

Mr. BURNETT. If I may interrupt the gentleman, I have only half an hour. This is a matter that the gentleman can present under the five-minute rule, and there are some of my colleagues on the committee who want to speak.

Mr. LONDON. I will complete the question in a moment. It is a fundamental question. I take it that the gentleman does not intend to do any wrong to any innocent person.

Mr. BURNETT. Of course not.

Mr. LONDON. Should not some opportunity be given to a person accused of advocating a doctrine subversive of society to prove that he is innocent?

Mr. CANNON. But if the gentleman will allow me, after the order is made for deportation the individual can appeal to the courts and have his hearing on habeas corpus.

Mr. BURNETT. Just as in any other case under the present law.

Mr. LONDON. If the gentleman from Alabama will yield for just a moment, that is the very point I have raised. I contend that the decision in the Turner case holds the very contrary; that in the Turner case, 194 United States, the court decided that the decision of the Secretary of Labor, which means the decision of the person acting on behalf of the Secretary of Labor, is final and conclusive on the court.

Mr. SINNOTT. On the facts.

Mr. LONDON. On the facts. That is the very meat of the decision in the Turner case, so that the person is left without any remedy whatever. An innocent person may be deported without any opportunity for a hearing and without any opportunity for a trial.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not want to keep my colleagues on the committee from having an opportunity to speak, but I will yield for a short question.

Mr. KINCHELOE. In case some one was arrested for some violation of the espionage act, and while in the custody of the court and probably being tried it should appear that he came within the purview of this bill also, in that event would there be any conflict between the court and the Department of Labor in the administration of this law?

Mr. BURNETT. I hardly think an executive officer could take away a defendant who was already in the hands of a court. The general rule, where there is a conflict between State and Federal courts, is that the court first getting jurisdiction holds the man; and I should think the same rule would apply, unless the court itself thought it was a case for deportation and should enter a nolle prosequi and dismiss the case and turn the defendant over to the Secretary of Labor for deportation.

Mr. KINCHELOE. But if the court should insist on its jurisdiction the department would be deprived of the right to deport him under this bill.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; the court by proper proceeding might take him from the Secretary, but the Secretary could not take him from the court.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to the fact that he has used 25 minutes.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BURNETT. The Chairman calls my attention to the fact that I have already used 25 minutes, and I have but 5 minutes remaining. I do not want to be discourteous, but I must yield to my colleagues on the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will yield the gentleman five minutes, and he can answer in my time.

Mr. BURNETT. Then I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. Is there any provision in this bill for denaturalizing those aliens who have become citizens?

Mr. BURNETT. Not for deporting them, because they would not be aliens if they were naturalized.

Mr. DOWELL. I understand that the provision of section 2 do not apply to those who have become naturalized; but is there any provision in the law for denaturalizing those who have been naturalized?

Mr. BURNETT. No. A person may under existing law be denaturalized for fraud. A court in New Jersey, in the case of an alien who had been naturalized for many years and who afterwards became pro-German, held that the man should be denaturalized, and the court annulled his citizenship papers, because the court said that the subsequent conduct of the man showed that years before he had gained a fraudulent naturalization, and therefore his papers were annulled. Whether that will stand in the appellate court I do not know, but there is no doubt that where naturalization was procured by fraud the courts have held that to be a sufficient reason for denaturalization. Where the evidence is sufficient, even from the subsequent conduct of the man, to show that he had obtained his naturalization by fraud, the court would certainly have the right to denaturalize him.

Mr. DOWELL. But it would only be by presenting him on the ground of obtaining the naturalization through fraud.

Mr. BURNETT. That is as far as the statute now goes.

A bill is now pending before my committee introduced by my good friend from Texas, Mr. CONNELLY, providing for expulsion of aliens who are found guilty of sedition or disloyalty. I referred this bill to both the Departments of Justice and of Labor. Both departments have reported on the bill. The Department of Labor favors its general provisions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, this bill is one more step on the part of the United States toward the cleaning up of its citizenship. I am hopeful that when the Members of this House go to their districts this fall to meet their constituents all of the Members will undertake to show to their people the great steps taken by this Congress toward the perfecting of the citizenship of all loyal and well-meaning persons within our borders, and to show to their people the absolute fairness of the Government toward aliens in the United States, even to the permitting of the taking of steps toward citizenship of certain persons now classified as alien enemies. In fact, the numerous bills brought out within the past few weeks by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, of which I have the honor to be a member, and enacted into law, have been more than fair—they have been generous—and I am glad that this is so.

But while holding out the promises of citizenship and of a square deal to all aliens who have come among us, what are we to do with those aliens who come, stay with us, claim the protection of our laws, violate those laws, preach revolution, destruction of property, and overthrow of the Government? Our laws provide for the deportation of certain offenders, among others anarchists, but there is a provision in the law that they can only be deported prior to five years' residence. If they are not deported within five years from their arrival, they are left with us, not as citizens but as aliens, free to poison the minds not only of citizens but newly arrived aliens. The present bill corrects that. Further, when the Government undertook to deport certain aliens under the new clauses—preaching the overthrow of Government, destruction of property, and so on—it was found that these clauses were so placed in the bill they might be read as definitions of the word "anarchist." In a way this nullified the new clauses. The bill before us corrects that.

The United States needs the full force of all of the deportation clauses in its immigration and naturalization laws. The new clauses were not placed in the statutes easily. Some years ago it was recognized that the United States had reached a size in population which made it necessary for it to take protective steps for itself, and in the immigration bill bearing the name of the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] the deportation clauses were enlarged so as to permit the deporting of those who preached or advocated the overthrow of organized government, and who preached or advocated the destruction of property. I have always felt proud that I had something to do with placing those words in the immigration bill, having had experience before I came to Congress with the growth and development of the I. W. W. organization, which advocates those very things. And yet the clauses are not aimed especially at that organization, but at all who are conniving and scheming for the destruction of this Government. When the bill had passed this House you will remember it was vetoed by the President in a message dated January 28, 1915, in which the President said concerning the new deportation section:

> It seeks to all but close entirely the gates of asylum which have always been open to those who could find nowhere else the right and opportunity of constitutional agitation for what they conceived to be the natural and inalienable rights of men.
> Restrictions like these, adopted earlier in our history as a Nation, would very materially have altered the course and cooled the humane ardors of our politics. The right of political asylum has brought to this country many a man of noble character and elevated purpose who was marked as an outlaw in his own less fortunate land, and who has yet become an ornament to our citizenship and to our public councils.

Now, gentlemen, that was all very true when our population was much smaller than it is now. An amendment was made to care for political refugees. But times change. Revolutionists of a new school have been coming to the United States for some time. They bring their ideas of revolution with them. They do not know just what kind of a revolution they want, but they want one, and they fall in readily with the teachers and anti-Government agitators in the United States. Why should these aliens be permitted to remain here? [Applause.]

And, of course, the war has accentuated the situation. Many persons see the rats gnawing at the very foundations of our Government who could not see before. But there was no war when these clauses were first written into the bill, which did not become a law until February, 1917.

Mr. Chairman, I have contended for many years past, as I have seen secret organizations forming in this country, containing many members who are not citizens and who do not manifest any desire to become citizens——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And not fit to be citizens.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And not fit to be citizens, signing a constitution of resistance, pledging themselves to the overthrow of this Government, and practicing the doctrines of sabotage—I have felt that when they came to our shores and took advantage of the rights and privileges we have offered them, to build up a revolution in this country, it was time for us to protect ourselves, time for us to insist that our population throughout the country should consist of those who either were citizens or in the process of citizenship, and that others should not have a right to agitate or preach or attempt the destruction of a government of which they are not even a part.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. As a matter of historic interest, I would like to ask the gentleman when and where the I. W. W.'s were organized?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Very briefly, for I do not want to use much time, I will say that the I. W. W. organization is, in my opinion, an outgrowth of the old Western Federation of Miners. The formation was developed by a man named Troutmann. I believe he lived in Pennsylvania. Their preamble starts out that labor and capital have nothing in common. The organization declares its purpose to be to destroy society—to overturn civilization—to stamp out individuality, and to erase the laws of private property of any sort, whether of money, land, rights, mental attainment, or manual skill.

It openly says that the question of right and wrong does not concern its members. It is a treasonable organization. Many incoming aliens have fallen under its sway. And, mind you, the leaders of that particular organization pledge their members not to vote or to take part in the affairs of the Government except as they can connive to tear it down.

Gentlemen, I have never thought it right for the United States to permit people to live in the United States who were not citizens and who showed no signs of becoming citizens, and at the same time permit them to have the right to edit newspapers and magazines telling the people of the United States how to run their Government. [Applause.] I never could see why aliens should be permitted to speak from platforms, pulpits, or soap boxes in words derogatory of our Government, with the destruction of the Government as their aim. I never could see that it was right. [Applause.] I have wondered and have asked over and over again why certain men were not deported after we got the Burnett bill passed, and yet lawyers defended these men on the ground that the meaning of the law was not clear. Why in a time of war, or a time of peace even, should any alien in the United States tell our people how to run their Government? What would happen to me if I went to Canada and undertook to establish a newspaper, preach revolution, and tell the people there what kind of a government they should have, or if I went to Great Britain or any other country? I am glad that we have reached a point where we are to perfect this matter of deportation, and I doubt if there will be a single vote against the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to occupy the time assigned to me on this bill, and, while advocating its passage earnestly, in discussing a situation that has become serious and critical in the United States and demands the attention not only of those in executive positions but also in the Congress and of the public at large. I refer to the activities of German sympathizers and the depredations of the German propagandists throughout the United States. These are aimed at in this bill. The extent and enormity of the crimes committed by German sympathizers against our Government in order to interfere with our war activities and against private citizens engaged in governmental work has been such as to warrant on my part an investigation into a list of crimes committed by German sympathizers in the United States during the past year, since war was declared by our Government against Germany.

These depredations began on the 2d day of April, 1917, the very day that Congress convened, and I have traced them down to April, 1918, during which time 134 definite acts of violence—which I have selected from many acts of violence—resulting in the destruction of property, and in some instances in the destruction of life, have been committed, and these 134 acts occasioned a loss and destruction by fire, explosion, and other means of $43,558,000 to our Government and to our citizens, and I can safely say that in nearly every instance the aim of the criminal was to interfere with our war activities, to destroy property ultimately designed for that use.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Not now. I mean no discourtesy to the gentleman, but I have not the time.

I shall append to these remarks, for the information of the Members of Congress and of the country, an itemized list giving the dates, the character of the property destroyed, the place of its location, and its value, with the hope that our Department of Justice may be stimulated to greater activity, and that this Congress will enact more stringent laws, for such are required, and with the enforcement of such laws these scoundrels and outlaws may be apprehended and tried as spies and shot as a proper punishment for the outrageous crimes they have committed, for in nearly every case human life was put in jeopardy.

Mr. Chairman, in the enactment of every law three things ought to be considered—the evil to be corrected; the old law, if any exists; and the new law, which proposes to apply proper and adequate punishment. The Department of Justice has suggested that our laws on the Federal statute books are insufficient to bring about the punishment of those committing these outrageous depredations and crimes.

A mere statement of these crimes and acts of lawlessness will lay firmly the ground for the statement that there is an existing evil crying repeatedly for the enactment of proper laws to prevent the continuance of it.

Turning to the calendar of this House we find a large number of bills have been introduced for the purpose of suppressing these acts of lawlessness against our country and our citizens.

First. House bill 9504 purports to be an amendment to section 4067 of the Revised Statutes extending the provisions of the criminal act to women over 14 who are alien enemies and commit acts of hostility during the war, but this act lacks the death penalty which it should have attached to it in order to make it a terror to criminals of this class.

Second. House bill 10068 is pending in the House, not yet acted upon, proposing during the present war to punish those convicted of conspiracy to destroy property of the United States necessary for the prosecution of the war, by fine and imprisonment, which is entirely inadequate as a means of preventing the crimes that are being committed at this time, a list of which I will append to my remarks.

Third. House bill 10204, now pending in the House, also provides for the punishment of those who willfully injure or destroy war materials or war premises during the war. It provides punishment only of fine and imprisonment, which will be invaluable as a deterrent for the criminals with which it proposes to deal.

Fourth. House bill 10629 is a bill providing for the death penalty of those convicted as spies, which bill has not as yet been reported by the committee, but is a very proper bill to be enacted.

Fifth. House bill 10630 is of similar import, but has not been considered or acted on by the House.

Sixth. House bill 11232 is a bill pending in the House to prohibit the activities of spies and prevent the injury to forts, docks, and munition plants, whether owned by the Government or engaged in Government activities, and provides for a death penalty upon conviction. This bill has not been acted upon and is still in committee.

Seventh. House bill 11187 is a bill to provide for the punishment of disloyalty, sabotage, and acts of terrorism, and provides a fine and imprisonment only as a punishment if convicted under its provisions. This bill is pending in committee and has not been acted upon. The punishment is entirely inadequate to make the bill effective if it should follow out its provisions, but it probably will not.

Eighth. House bill 11279 is a bill introduced to protect citizens against lynching in default of protection by the States, and refers to the conditions that exist in Missouri, but the punishment provided does no exceed five years' imprisonment or $5,000 fine. This bill is pending and probably will not be acted upon for the obvious reason that its penalties are totally inadequate and it would be ineffective if passed.

Ninth. House joint resolution 275 is for the purpose of permitting the United States to dismiss from its employ those who are guilty of disloyalty or utters any unpatriotic, disloyal, abusive, or seditious language, or who in an abusive and violent manner criticizes the President, the Army, or Navy, or the flag. This resolution has not been considered by the committee. I have introduced a bill providing the death penalty for those convicted of these crimes where death results, which I hope will pass.

From this review of the pending legislation it is quite evident that Congress has not been up until this time sufficiently active in passing laws to punish the enemies of our country. I hold no brief in this case against the Members of Congress to criticize those responsible for this record. I am quite well aware as a Member of this body that the infliction of the death penalty has been abolished in probably one-third of the States of the Union, and is regarded with disfavor by a vast and growing proportion of our people. The State of Pennsylvania, which I have the honor in part to represent on the floor of the House, has adhered strictly to the law inflicting the death penalty in this regard and has enforced it in cases of murder of first degree with unrelenting certainty in all cases where conviction of that offense occurred, and I firmly believe in that law and in its rigorous, punctual, and certain enforcement, but I am also aware that there are other States that hold differently.

Mr. Chairman, we are at war with the most savage foe and most completely organized, barbarous, cruel, and resourceful enemy that ever confronted the civilized nations in time of war.

These offenses establish, by the facts that I have taken the care to tabulate and collect as part of these remarks, that Germany has had in our midst since the outbreak of the war a completely organized and liberally paid propaganda, the purpose of which is to prevent the United States from entering the war in the first instance and to breed discontent and dissatisfaction not only in our Army and in the departments of our Government, but among our people in every branch of our industrial and social life.

The exposures of the State Department in disposing of communication between the German foreign minister, Zimmermann, and the German ambassador, Bernstorff, to the United States, the purpose of which was only to stir up sedition and discontent and open revolt not only in our own country, but to embroil us in war with Mexico and Japan, was the first shock the American people received as to the widespread acts of the German propagandists and spies here in our midst.

The public press of this country on the 24th of April, 1918, advises us that there is great unrest and threatened revolution on in Mexico as the result of German activities, also in Costa Rica and in nearly every State in South America. There is no doubt but that the strikes in our shipyards, the unrest in various other branches of our industry, is the result of the activities of these German agents. These facts are so overwhelming in the conclusiveness of their purpose that it is time that this Congress would enact laws that would make it possible for the United States district courts to convict these German spies and German propagandists and impose the death penalty on them by promptly having them shot by a firing squad as guilty of treason.

Our people have become impatient with these conditions, and unless something is done we will have riots and acts of violence and deeds of lawlessness all over the country. In fact, we have had several very conspicuous illustrations which exhibit the temper of our people.

On the 4th of April last Robert P. Praeger, supposed to be of German parentage, was hanged to a tree at Collinsville, Ill., by a mob of 350 people, who broke into the basement of the city hall where he was hiding. Praeger was accused of making disloyal remarks in an address at a public meeting at Marysville, Ill. Collinsville is a city of 4,000 people, situated some 12 miles east of St. Louis.

The following are some of the instances where the people have taken the law in their own hands and by acts of violence punished those guilty of unpatriotic deeds:

Santa Fe, N. Mex., April 18: Four hundred convicts in the State penitentiary yesterday tarred and feathered one John M. Birkner, of Camp Cody, Deming, N. Mex., held in the penitentiary as a Federal prisoner. Birkner was born in Germany and is alleged to have said, "You can't beat the Dutch," and some other similar derogatory remarks against our country.

April 12: Ernest Gellert is alleged to have been murdered at Fort Hancock, N. J., because he was a socialist and pacifist and refused to submit to military discipline.

Vicksburg, Miss., April 17, William A. Hunter was tarred and feathered on the charge of being disloyal to the Union and refusal to buy liberty bond.

Christopher, Ill., March 23, three men were tarred and feathered, compelled to kiss the American flag, and run out of town because of pro-German utterances.

Marshalltown, Iowa, March 19, Raymond W. Hall, of Minerva, who was in the last draft contingent, claimed exemption under the agricultural classification. He was taken by masked men, driven 8 miles in an automobile, painted from head to foot with yellow paint, and left to walk home.

In my own district many men have been tarred and feathered and ducked for suspected disloyalty.

April 20, it was openly charged in the Senate that there are over 20,000 German spies in America. Charles Warren, Assistant Attorney General, resigned because he regarded the law as inadequate, as I am informed, although of this I am not sure. He was in charge of espionage cases.

Therefore I believe that I have shown that the necessity for the enactment of legislation in regard to this situation is imperative, and those charged with the duty of bringing in such law, who control the Judiciary Committee of this House, should no longer delay action in this regard.

Mr. Chairman, I have no patience with milk-and-water policies during this critical period in our national history. I favor a policy that would stop entirely the teaching of the German language in our schools in the United States. Teach English, teach Americanism. Our motto should be that no man should be retained in the public service who is not loyal and who can not be trusted and who is not in entire sympathy with our Government in the prosecution of this war to its successful and victorious conclusion. Nothing short of the complete conquest of Germany and the overthrow of her military power and of her allies will satisfy the American people. "We have put our hand to the plow and we will not turn back."

Mr. Chairman, there are in Washington men who hold high diplomatic positions and who ought to be fair and decent to the United States, and whose protection they enjoy, but who are not; and there is information going constantly from Washington to our enemies, and our Government, through diplomatic courtesy, is submitting to these acts of wrong against our people and our Nation.

The time is when we ought to declare war against Turkey and Bulgaria and send their representatives out of the country, and the time is when several other alleged neutral representatives that are in Washington should be given notice that their activities must cease.

There are at least two representatives of two alleged neutral countries whose activities and conduct are not above suspicion. Let us have more Americanism in this war. Let us stop giving any information to any nation or individual who is not supporting the President, the administration, and our country in fighting this war to the utmost of his ability. The United States as well as Germany was a party to The Hague convention, and that convention defined a spy to be—

> One who, acting clandestinely or on false pretenses, obtains, or seeks to obtain, information in the zone of operations of a belligerent with the intention of communicating it to the hostile party.

In the last year there were many such criminals, and yet not one has been shot or hung, so far as I have been able to ascertain.

This temporizing with lawlessness has reached the limit, and Members of Congress at least should cease longer to tolerate it and place upon the statute books laws that will enforce this article of international law here in our country.

Let us adopt as our motto the words of old Gen. Israel Putnam, the Revolutionary patriot, who during the Revolutionary War caught a British spy within his lines and notified the British general promptly as follows:

> I have the honor to inform you that I have caught one of your command within the American lines. He was arrested as a spy, he will be tried as a spy, and if convicted he will be hanged as a spy.
> P. S.—He was hanged at 4 o'clock to-day.

We need more Putnams on the job. [Applause.]

A CHRONOLOGICAL LIST OF PLOTS, CRIMES, ETC., INVOLVING THE DESTRUCTION OF HEALTH, LIFE, OR PROPERTY IN THE UNITED STATES.

[These items are taken from the New York Times Index covering the months from April, 1917, to April, 1918. The dates given refer to the time of publication of the news item.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER].

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I think one of the most interesting facts that have been brought out during the past year is that the gentlemen in this country who for the last 25 years have claimed protection under the American flag and have at the same time been producing propaganda for the purpose of dissolving our republican form of government have been the latest arrivals when it came to standing up to save the life of this Government. It should cause every man to pause and think. I hear gentlemen get on the floor here and refer to that flag. Mr. Chairman, that flag was put over a constitutional representative form of government by the men who gave their lives to establish that government, and it is rather cheap patriotism for men who are insisting on the dissolution of this system of government to appeal for protection under that flag while they do it. That is what has been going on, however, for the last quarter of a century. It has had all sorts of names. Sometimes it has been called socialism, sometimes populism, and sometimes it has been called pacificism and various other kinds of isms. Always it has had the same ultimate purpose, and that was to enervate the American Government. I want to say for the Immigration Committee when the question was brought up here a while ago whether this law applied to citizens of the United States, that the only reason it does not apply to those gentlemen is that we do not have jurisdiction. If you will fix the law in some way so that we can get a crack at those fellows, they will get it from the Committee on Naturalization and Immigration. We have gone just as far as we can in this bill, but for the future life of this country we have got to go further with such types, whether they be alien or citizen. If this Nation is to continue to exist as a nation, the men who stand for our government and our Constitution have got to bind themselves together as the representative government group, and we have got to put down the Bolsheviki. We have a Bolsheviki in the United States to-day just as certainly as they have had it in Russia, and it works along the same line so far as it is permitted to operate. Sometimes it finds its representative in the parlor socialist, sometimes a kind-hearted anarchist in public life, or of wealth, or in a university or college somewhere, who calls himself a professor; but we must remember that the teachings percolate down from the highbrow to the man who uses a gun.

Whatever there may be in America that finds its ultimate expression in the use of the torch or the gun by the lowbrow, the bolsheviki, the anarchist, the socialist has found his patron saint somewhere in high authority in the United States. The more dangerous man of the two is the teacher, and yet in times past we have permitted these men and women to run loose in the country and to advocate their doctrines, and when they have been called to account for it they have whiningly declared that they were under the protection of the flag of the Union! Mr. Chairman, that is not the flag of a man of that type, and he has no right to its protection in peace or in war. We men are seeing this Nation now passing through a trial by fire. We are going to face in the next few months in a great political campaign the insidious doctrine that is called pacificism or socialism, which will be the hiding place of the pro-German who no longer dares to say he is a friend and an aid to our enemy, who goes just one step further back and says, "I think this time I shall have to support the socialist movement in this country." The socialist movement is just as dangerous to America as it has been fatal to Russia. The socialist movement is just as dangerous to the United States as it has been anywhere else. This bill, so far as our committee is concerned, goes to the last limit in saying to the world what the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization thinks of the teachers of this kind of heresy in America. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, since my membership on the Committee on Immigration I have assisted at the making of several very good laws, but I have never helped to bring a bill into this House in which I took more pleasure than in this which seeks to prevent anarchists from coming into the country, and seeks also to provide a means of getting rid of those that we have. I think that any sound American with respect for law and order will admit that there is no anarchist of any degree of faith whose room is not vastly better than his company, and if we can get rid of them in a legal way, by all means we should do it. This first paragraph of the bill which we have submitted for the consideration of the House says that aliens who are anarchists shall be excluded from admission into the United States; that aliens who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, or of all forms of law, shall be treated in the same way; and that aliens who disbelieve in or are opposed to organized government shall go. We can not stand for them, because the Republic of the United States is a government of law, a government of order, committed to the protection of life and property, and neither is safe in the society that harbors anarchists.

Mr. Chairman, I hope there is no Member of this House who will not agree with the language of the first section of the bill, that the stand which the members of our committee took in adopting and reporting this measure was right and that we must get rid of these people if we are to have security. If we are to weld together for one united and harmonious action all the forces of our country, we must get rid of these people as quickly as possible. While it may be impossible to deport them at this time, we certainly can make them harmless by limiting the sphere of their activities to four strong walls, and that I would certainly favor.

If one wants to understand perfectly the effect of anarchy and the sort of thing which it substitutes for orderly government, which our ancestors when they founded this Government believed in and provided for in a very wise document, all he has to do is what my friend from Missouri just now suggested, study the conditions in Russia. There you have a perfect illustration of how anarchy works out. There you have complete governmental chaos. There you have no security for society in any way for life or property. In Russia you have a whole community, vast as it is, numbering approximately 180,000,000 people, given over to discord—to anarchy, in a word. In order that we may use all of the forces of this country and bring into harmonious cooperation all of the elements of our citizenry to prosecute our war for "self-determination, for democracy," we must get rid of these people, who are, as was suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER], undermining the effectiveness of our efforts by an insidious and dangerous propaganda. I do not believe there are many, but there should be none. Our mighty efforts in the greatest war of all history must not be hampered by anarchistic teachings.

Undoubtedly the same class of people are to-day operating in Mexico and adjacent countries to develop among the rather backward people who make up the masses of those countries a feeling of hostility to the United States, as they have had a feeling of hostility to property, which is truly an anarchistic characteristic, unless the property happens to be that of the anarchist himself, which has been illustrated by the revolutions that have gone on in Mexico for the last eight years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will yield the gentleman the remainder of my time—two minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I thank the gentleman. Mr. Chairman, one of the peculiar features of the revolutions in Mexico in the last few years has been from the beginning a manifest hostility to things. Revolutionary bodies have destroyed their own property in paroxysms of rage, under the teachings of American anarchists sometimes, and that is what they would do here if they could. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this measure, which the committee was unanimous in reporting, earnest and zealous in its advocacy, will pass the House without a discordant vote, without amendments being offered, without any change whatever. It will be notice to this anarchistic element that this is a government of law and order and that we do not propose that they shall interfere in our activities in prosecuting a war for self-determination, for democracy—in other words, that we will not tolerate any tricks that may be resorted to to weaken our morale and cohesion, and that any resident of this Republic who engages in such propaganda does so at the peril of his personal liberty; and I hope that when any are found and convicted the law will be inexorably enforced in its extremest penalties. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this bill carries out to my mind the endeavor of the committee originally, and when the bill, now the law, was passed four years ago I offered to the committee the following provision, which afterwards became a law: "who advocate or teach the unlawful destruction of property." It was included in the bill that no one could teach the unlawful destruction of property. I am sorry to say that when the first veto was had upon the bill that was one of the reasons it was vetoed because we did not include a sufficient saving clause. As a member of the subcommittee I participated in drawing the provision that is now in the bill, and the President saw no objection to it in giving his last veto to the bill, and it finally became the law. The proviso reads:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall exclude, if otherwise admissible, persons convicted, or who admit the commission, or who teach or advocate the commission, of an offense purely political.

This provision of the bill under consideration now was the same involved in the original bill and had the same intent, that of excluding anarchists. The word has been somewhat confused in that some contend an anarchist must mean one who believes in the destruction of government or property by force or taking of life by overt acts. The real interpretation of the word is one who is against all forms of government and destruction whether by force or otherwise, and the man who teaches anarchy or who teaches opposition to all organized government, whether he himself participates in the force, is more dangerous than the man who actually applies the force, because you can procure a low-type man to commit the force and he is driven on to that act by the man with knowledge and with experience and one who is familiar with and has dealings with men. So the purpose of this bill is to reach into the teachings of those people who have been going from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the Canadian line to the Gulf, teaching this doctrine of opposition to government, and while not becoming naturalized remain here as aliens and subjects of another country. Now, the law we propose in this bill is to reach them irrespective of the time they may have been in this country and to return them to the country from which they came. It is unfortunate for the country at the present time that this has not been the law in the past and that it has not been rigidly enforced. I am heartily in favor of this bill and all of its provisions. This country has no place for the anarchist.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That aliens who are anarchists; aliens who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all forms of law; aliens who disbelieve in or are opposed to organized government; aliens who advocate or teach the assassination of public officials; aliens who advocate or teach the unlawful destruction of property; aliens who are members of or affiliated with any organization that entertains, teaches, or advocates the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all forms of law, or that entertains or teaches disbelief in or opposition to organized government, or that advocates the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character, or that advocates or teaches the unlawful destruction of property, shall be excluded from admission into the United States.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer two amendments, and I shall call attention to them now. In line 6 of the bill as reported, after the words "opposed to," add the word "all," so that it will read "who disbelieve in or are opposed to all organized government." In line 1, page 2, after the words "opposition to," insert the word "all."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BURNETT: Page 1, line 6, after the word "to," insert the word "all," and on page 2, line 1, after the word "to," insert the word "all."

Mr. BURNETT. In speaking to it a moment ago I had the original bill in mind, and perhaps I called attention to the wrong line.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment undoubtedly is one to which there can be no possible objection, for, so far as anarchy is concerned, we have an organized Government. So using the expression "all organized government" will not add to or take from the material meaning of the present language of the bill. The term "anarchy" means the absence of all political government; by extensions, confusion in government; the absence of government; a state of society where there is no law or supreme power; a social theory which regards the union of order with the absence of all direct government of man by man as the political ideal; absolute individual liberty.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Where is that definition from?

Mr. RAKER. This is taken from Bouvier's Law Dictionary, the latest edition.

So we are arriving at the conclusion, to extend a little further my short remarks under general debate, to reach the man who believes in the destruction of organized government by force, who believes in the destruction of property by force, who believes in committing crimes in violation of the law either by himself or by some agency of his. But, in addition to that, the most dangerous man to this country and the most dangerous anarchist—because that is what he is, and there are two classes—is the man who teaches and says that there shall be no form of government and "I am entitled to all the individual rights, and there shall be no restraint upon me." Of course, a man who destroyed property, if necessary; who took life, if necessary; but says, "Individually I would not do it, individually I would not burn a man's house, but for a man to get his liberty it is the only thing for him to do," uses an insidious way of getting the weak and the feeble—those are willing to destroy by their own physical acts, to do the act, to violate the law, to destroy government, to destroy property, and to take life. And it is the very object and purpose of this bill—and there should be no misunderstanding or any covering up of the idea of the committee—to get after the fellow that teaches this, but who at the same time says, so there can be no misunderstanding, "I am opposed to this form of government; I am opposed to the actual taking of life or destruction of property, but I believe in all these conditions if you want to get these results." And, in a nice, suave way, says, "I would not do this, but that is the only way we can have it accomplished."

Originally, when the bill came up for consideration four years ago, and then two years ago, wherein this provision as to excluding those who advocate the unlawful destruction of property was contained, there was some slight criticism made, or some stricture made, that the members of the committee that reported the bill came from suffrage States, and that women would be more liable, and had been, to commit these acts than men. We are in a position to report to-day that that statement is not true, and the public knows it ought to have been branded as false, which it was; but the conduct and the acts of our women of this country have demonstrated to the world, and by their every thought and every deed, that they have been for this Government; that they have been against lawlessness and disorder and in favor of enforcing the law as against sabotage.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman mean to extend upon this bill the remarks the gentleman has been making?

Mr. RAKER. Upon the bill under consideration, with all the varied and ramifying effects it will have, because it is very extensive.

Mr. WALSH. I trust the extension will be as interesting as the remarks we have heard.

Mr. RAKER. I thank the distinguished gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that the enactment of this measure is one of the necessary acts for the accomplishment of America's one business to-day—the overthrow of Prussianism.

In this morning's newspapers is the statement that the Kaiser has sacrificed uselessly in this latest western-front drive 500,000 men. This Kaiser-made war is the bloodiest exhibition of anarchistic desire to overwhelm free governments and destroy free peoples that the world has ever seen.

Anarchists here in America who sanctify the use of assassination, incendiarism, poison, poinard, rope, and dynamite in their efforts to overthrow American Government are deadly foes, matching the Huns in their malignant assaults.

No action is too drastic, no measure too severe for the protection of the American Government and American institutions against such destructive attacks from within our own breastworks.

The ruin of Russia has been wrought by these destroyers of organized government, incited to their work by German influence. The pitiable plight of that nation, helpless before her foes, should inspire America to take any action necessary to prevent the activities of those who would gladly see America share the same fate.

America proposes here and now to make the American melting pot produce a steel ingot of noble purpose. After a year of war we find in that melting pot sticks and stones and dangerous substances which will not fuse into that purpose of Americanism.

There is only one thing to do. Skim off the dross and throw it on the slag heap where it belongs. That is exactly what this measure provides. These dangerous elements, impossible of fusing, shall from this time on not be put into the American melting pot, or, if found there, shall be cast out.

Mr. Chairman, the only objection to this measure and similar measures that I have seen appears in certain publications which declare that Congress is enacting despotic measures which are in defiance of real American principles. It has been stated by them and by more or less disloyal speakers that the framers of the Declaration of Independence would be arrested and imprisoned if they were here in these days.

I hope no one here will be misled into thinking that the framers of the Declaration of Independence hesitated for a moment when confronted by the critical conditions we confront to-day. These fathers of the American Nation went ten times further than the Government of to-day has gone in dealing with enemies inside the breastworks. They knew well that they were fighting for their lives and homes and country and any man who sought their protection and at the same time opposed them and their cause was landed behind prison bars without trial or waste of time whatever.

When those old fighters for America started on a path they went the whole way. About the first thing they did in the Continental Congress was to provide for the selection of a committee of safety in every township and county. That committee was charged with finding out how every citizen of the community stood on the question of the independence of the colonies. If they found a man opposed to the American cause, they ostracized him from every standpoint—religious, social, business, and political.

When they found that some of these Tories were so lost to all decency that such treatment did not effect them, the Continental Congress passed this resolution:

Resolved, That it be recommended to the several provincial assemblies or conventions or councils or committees of safety to arrest and secure every person in their respective Colonies whose going at large may, in their opinion, endanger the safety of the Colonies or the liberties of America.

Mr. Chairman, there was no conviction necessary nor even trial. If this committee of patriotic citizens felt that a Tory's presence and going at large was a source of danger they were ordered to clap him into jail.

In 1777 the very men who adopted the declaration, assembled in the Continental Congress, went still further. We must admit that they knew as much about liberty and the rights of man as any anarchist or pro-German in America to-day. They knew something, too, about dealing with treacherous ones inside their own ranks. In the Journal of Congress for that year you will read this resolution:

Resolved, That it be recommended to the executive powers of the several States forthwith to apprehend and seize all persons who have in their general conduct and conversation evinced a disposition inimical to the cause of America and that the persons so seized be confined in such manner as shall be consistent with their several characters and the security of their persons.

That same Congress requested the State of Pennsylvania to arrest and imprison all persons who were talking against the independence of America. When one man wrote a letter to a friend in England saying that the Colonies were sick of war these signers of the declaration ordered the letter seized and sent the writer of it to jail to stay there until released by a future order.

Oh, no, these founders of the Nation were not afraid of being charged with arbitrary arrests when the entire fate of their Nation hung in the balance and when Tories were thick as bees. They ordered their committees to arrest these anti-Americans, and if necessary to call on the Continental troops for help. They landed the governor of Maryland behind the bars when he talked treason. They arrested men who undertook to travel from one city to another without a pass. No waiting for indictment by grand jury and trial. They felt that the times demanded immediate action and they took it.

They interfered with free speech and free press and free assemblage to found this Nation. A preacher by the name of Daniels would not pray for the American cause and they put him into jail until he could get real religion. They took printing plants away from Tories and gave them to good Americans to run. They broke up meetings where sedition was the topic of discussion. They declared by a hundred acts that no man has a right to the protection of the American flag while he is trying to destroy the Government for which it stands.

I am giving these historical facts to show how the framers of the Declaration of Independence dealt with sedition at home. We have not gone so far in this period of danger, and I hope we may never need to go so far. But if we did follow these old nation builders, the tender-skinned, personal-liberty worshippers of the writers of the immortal declaration would be playing checkers through prison bars instead of being at liberty.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to take this opportunity to call attention to certain classes of anti-Americans who are opposing this war and its effective prosecution. They are not aliens and they are not anarchists, but, consciously or unconsciously, they are striking blows at the Government of the United States.

America is engaged in a war in which her future existence is at stake. If Prussia wins, this Nation will become a vassal, passing under the yoke of submission to the most ruthless despotism that ever sought to establish world power by the sword.

In this war every ideal of government which we have boasted as American is also in the balance. We have seen the central powers revive barbarism, massacre, slavery, and pillage in defiance of every spark of humanity. Assassins of the sea have gloated over the destruction of neutral ships, with their helpless men and women and children.

Here is the life-and-death fight of dynasty against democracy. It is the crucial struggle of the organized forces of autocracy against liberty, light, and progress. If it is ended right, this tragic world agony will never recur. If it ends in the wrong way, we shall have war for centuries, war unremitted until nations and peoples grope their bloody way back to the point they had reached in August, 1914.

In the face of such momentous issues it is of vital importance that every effort be made to prevent division and dissension in our own ranks. Where the forces opposing America are willful and deliberate, as in the case of anarchists, they may be dealt with by the strong hand of the law.

In the case of individuals and organizations which are crying out against the war and are seeking to sway the judgment of others, it is high time that their arguments be analyzed and refuted.

Since America's declaration of war I have talked to thousands of persons concerning the issues involved and have read the material put out by many opposing organizations. I have tried to weigh the arguments advanced, and I believe I have heard or read every point which is made by the pacifist, pro-Germans, and anti-Americans of every caliber. Let us look them over.

One man told me that he was conscientiously opposed to all war. He said that all war is wrong, and that therefore he is opposed to America engaging in this war. He decried our entrance and our prosecution of it because of his conscience.

This man speaks for a class of objectors to the war. Let me say right here that I have a right to question the conscience of any man who lives and prospers under a free government, established by force of arms, and who yet refuses to defend that government against its enemies.

Our independence, our free institutions, our Nation are built upon the deeds of brave men who were willing to fight and die for freedom. How, then, can this conscientious objector to all war agree to share in them? How will his conscience permit him to ask protection from the armed police power that guards his life and property? How can he appeal for justice to the courts, which are based on the power of arms? Oh, no; if he were really conscientious, he would not ask for protection and claim rights from the Nation, which exists to-day only because it has been able to defend itself in the past and is able to defend itself now.

If these peace-at-any-price pacifists are right, then the War of the Revolution was a colossal crime. Americans should have kissed the feet of George III instead of fighting him. Paul Revere, instead of performing a heroic act, committed a crime. Gates and Putnam and Lafayette violated the higher laws of humanity, and George Washington was the master villain of them all. If it is wrong to fight to-day, it was wrong to fight in 1776. If the United States has no right to assist France now, then France had no right to assist us in our war for liberation.

What do these peace-at-any-price pacifists think of those gallant warriors at Gettysburg, beating back the full tide of human slavery and disunion? Do they brand as criminals those soldiers who marched 40 miles without food or sleep or rest or shelter from the hot July sun and then went forward on the run to the music of the cannon as men might flock to a feast? There those fighters for freedom stood, nailed to their positions through three long days of mortal hell, while the crashing waves of Pickett's charge broke in storms of shot and shell, and mangled, gasping comrades died in agony all around. They proved with musket ball and bayonet stroke, sword thrust and artillery that freedom is more powerful than slavery; that right is might in the end. Yet if it is wrong to-day to fight for the liberty of the world it was wrong to fight for the liberation of the black race in the sixties.

Mr. Chairman, if these persons who denounce all war are right, then the deeds which have made American heroes immortal were evil. John Paul Jones, amid crashing broadsides on his sinking vessel, shouting "I have not begun to fight" is not to be admired, but to be condemned. Lawrence, with his "Don't give up the ship"; Perry and his virile message, "We have met the enemy and they are ours"; Nathan Hale, in his hour of death saying, "I regret that I have but one life to give to my country"; Dix, with his clarion command, "If any man pulls down the American flag, shoot him on the spot"; all these were workers of evil and guilty of criminal acts if these pacifists are right.

But they are not right, and the great heart of the American people knows it well. God pity those men in this country who hold greedily to the fruits of all these battles and combats and yet are willing to degrade themselves into slaves, profiting from the fight for freedom on the part of others but refusing to lift a hand in that fight themselves.

These nonresistants are selfish and immoral beyond measure. They talk of nonresistance as though it concerned themselves alone. What of the vast numbers of men and women and children who have been slaughtered and those who are in dire danger to-day, while these, being able to help, refuse to lift a finger for their rescue? The conscience of men capable of such selfishness is a minus quality.

For my part, in spite of all their talk of conscience, I will not admit that they have a conscience at all. I would rather say that the generations of American patriots who have battled for freedom were the real possessors of conscience. I would rather have Cromwell's idea, who, in speaking of his invincible Old Ironsides, said, "I raised such men as had the fear of God before them, as made some conscience of what they did, and from that day forward they were never beaten, and whenever they were engaged against the enemy they overcame continuously."

That is the kind of conscientious citizens needed by America to-day. Let us pay no heed to those who would set their supposed consciences against the very integrity and safety of the Nation. They owe their agonies not to conscience, but to conceit. The really conscientious man to-day is not a weeping martyr before the iron facts that confront America and the world. He is the man who has connected his conscience with the welfare of the Republic and whose conscience compels him to defend the common good rather than to shirk his sacred obligations under the cloak of conscientious scruples against war.

For my part, I will wait until they show how to restrain ruthless brutality without using force before I agree with them. I will wait until these peace-at-any-price pacifists leave their doors unlocked and trust to arguments with burglars to prevent robberies; until they refuse to call upon police officers for protection of life and property before I admit they are sincere in their nonresistance. Until that time I maintain that it is better to fight for the right than to see the wrong triumph through the inaction of pacifists. Until then I say with Lowell:

God give us peace, not such as lulls to sleep,
But sword on thigh and brow with purpose knit.
And let our Ship of State to harbor sweep,
Her ports all up, her battle lanterns lit,
And her leashed thunders gathering for their leap.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another class of enemies of America in this hour of conflict. I talked to one of them some time ago. He said that this war is so horrible that it would be better to have it end now, even in a German victory, than to have it go on with its tremendous cost of life and treasure and its injury to our entire civilization. This is the coward objector with the yellow streak. He does not think war is wrong in itself, but he wants this war ended because it is costing too much to secure liberty. He will not consent to pay the price.

The man with the yellow streak is a danger in this time of peril. He will take events and circumstances and twist them to his own desire to justify himself in the eyes of his neighbors. The time of discouragement may come in this country, as it came to Russia, when there will be temptation to take a backward step. Then these cowardly objectors will seek to influence the actions of Government. They will demand that our high aims be revised, our sacred promises to our allies revoked.

It is scarcely worth while to argue with cowardice. The coward is utterly undependable and does not rely on argument. He relies on fear alone. But fear has never been an American characteristic when fighting for a noble cause. If one thing has been taught by this war, it is that all the horrors of twentieth century conflict, the bombs, and gas, and poisons, and scientific barbarism, can not frighten men fighting for the right. Millions of men have faced and are facing death in horrible forms without a tremor. Above all the inventions of science looms the courage of the human heart, dauntless and unafraid.

What we may do is to show clearly that we know these men of the yellow streak and that they shall not gain influence. They must be thwarted now and in the future before they work the mischief of which they are capable.

As far as a serious argument with these objectors is concerned, I would only say that it seems to me the peoples who have paid a price vastly more than we can possibly pay should be permitted to say something about it. The valiant warriors of Belgium, the noble French, the soldiers of the great British democracy—these have been paying the last full measure of devotion, and they declare with one voice that this war shall not end until its sacrifices shall not be in vain.

Not long ago I listened to Harry Lauder tell of his visits to the fighting front in Europe. He told us that little Scotland had sent 900,000 soldiers out of her 5,000,000 population and that more were being trained. Think of a levy like that, and not a voice raised to object because the price for world liberty is too high.

He said that he had talked with a regiment of Scottish soldiers in heart-to-heart fashion. When he asked what word they wanted sent back to their friends, this is their answer: "Tell the folks that we are here to stay till this thing is over. We will fight for 20 years more, if necessary, so that this monstrous despotism may never again bring such a disaster upon the world."

We should wait until the warriors of Bonnie Scotland, and of valiant France and Belgium and Serbia and Britain, who know all about the price, shall say it is too high for payment. Until that time let every American highly resolve that the price already paid shall not have been paid in vain.

Mr. Chairman, there is another class of enemies of America to-day. I picked up a circular recently and found a laborious argument against our prosecution of the war. These objectors said that they could not sanction it because they are internationals. They do not believe in national patriotism at all. They are citizens of the world.

Now, I can not believe that a man who is a bad citizen of America can possibly be a good citizen of the world. If he can not be loyal to a part, surely he can not be loyal to the whole. If he can see his own land go down in defeat and disaster without lifting a hand to help, what would he do when ruin faced lands far away.

The fact is that these transcendant individuals are not internationals at all. If they were they would answer a call from bleeding France or Belgium or Armenia just as quickly as they would answer a call for help from a neighbor attacked by a wild beast. If they were really internationals they would rise in holy rage against blasphemous Prussia, that drives roughshod over nations and sovereignties and tears up sacred international treaties as scraps of paper. If they could not bring themselves to support America, they still would enlist in the armies of other nations fighting to the death for the maintenance of international obligations.

However, if these superior individuals desire to scorn America and set themselves up as internationals, I am in favor of taking them at their word and treating them as internationals. The guarantees to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness are not international guarantees, but purely American. Free speech and free press and free assemblage are not international rights. They are strictly American rights.

The only place where international rights hold sway is out on the high sea, 3 miles from any national coast. There is where these internationals should be sent at once. There they could flourish under their boasted international rights, which would be to sail any place as long as they kept 3 miles from any civilized countries and out of the range of German torpedoes. They say they are citizens of the world. So let it be, for that means that they are citizens of no country, and America is vastly better off without them.

Mr. Chairman, some time ago I received a letter from a man who said he could not support America in this war because there has been no referendum taken to find out whether the people were for it or not. As one of the advocates of the referendum and direct legislation I have a right to say that such a suggestion at this time is a danger to the safety of America. I have always believed in the referendum wherever an honest expression of the people's will can be ascertained on a problem that remains the same for at least a month at a time. I have never advocated the referendum as a proper method of controlling foreign policies amidst the kaleidoscopic changes brought about by a world war.

Just think of what a nation-wide referendum would have meant at any time in the past year. If it were carried out it would have meant a campaign sure to poison our relationships with many other nations besides Germany. Unscrupulous propaganda would have been directed against England, Mexico, and Japan by those who desired to divert attention from the assaults of Germany upon us. Vast sums of money would be expended in frenzied appeals to both sides; the famed reptile fund of Prussia would be used with force, and at the end neither the President nor Congress would be a whit the wiser.

It would take 30 days to conduct a campaign and vote, at the very least. Can anyone frame a question to-day that will mean anything 30 days from now? Could it have been done before the declaration of war? Suppose we had taken it on the question of accepting the barred-zone ultimatum of Germany. Then suppose that were accepted and Germany made a barred zone of the entire Atlantic Ocean. Suppose, on the other hand, the decision were to protect American vessels in the barred zone and a ship carrying absolute contraband of war were destroyed by Germany.

The fact is that these decisions can not be made by a yes or no on any single question. The decision is upon a course of action composed of a series of problems, all subject to quick change and surprise and intrigue.

No; the real advocates of the referendum as a method of securing the people's will upon legislation were the ones who opposed this subtle effort to split America in two in the hour of crisis. The elements who have always fought the initiative, referendum, and recall, such as the German-American Alliance, which has spent millions in opposing local option, were the forces which called and are calling now for a nation-wide battle, so that the house divided against itself should not stand.

There is no need of a ballot-box decision to show where America stands on this war. By every test and by a patriotic revival such as was never witnessed in the Nation before, America has drawn the sword by the will of the vast majority, and she will not sheathe it until her objects have been attained and militarism destroyed.

Mr. Chairman, another enemy of America and objector to the war wrote a little booklet to air his treasonable views. I received a copy and read it carefully. He denounced the way in which America is fighting. He claims that he is willing to serve the Nation, but he must be permitted to choose just where he shall serve. He states that he believes in America's cause, but that he can not support the war itself because the Nation is choosing the line of service instead of the individual.

Now, that man and all like him are peculiar believers in America's cause. They believe we should make war but should make it inefficiently, so that millions more men than necessary will be killed. They would have us fight without effectiveness abroad and invite invasion at home.

Now, it should be recognized first of all that this attitude is essentially that of the anarchist, who maintains that the individual is not obliged to submit to any authority whatever. Those who hold such an idea now ought to have courage enough to take their stand with the anarchists, where they belong, and oppose all government.

It is scarcely necessary to point out that if this doctrine were accepted there could be no safety to life or property, no law and order anywhere. All these depend upon obedience to some authority. Individual rights must give way to the common welfare. The Government, acting as the agent of the majority, must coordinate the efforts of all citizens, using them where their services will be most valuable to the cause.

The true freedom, and that which America proposes to give to every citizen while this war lasts, is the freedom to do what he ought to do for the country's welfare and security.

Mr. Chairman, there is another class of opponents of America in this war, and they declare that as followers of the Man of Nazareth they can not encourage the conduct of this war.

I can not claim to be a theologian, but I can not find any warrant in the Bible for the assumption that the Master Christian was a peace-at-any-price pacifist. That One who said, "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I came to send, not peace, but a sword," was assuredly no peace-at-any-price man. He knew that His message of humanity and equal rights to all would in the end bring world conflict as sure as the sunrise. He knew that the supreme test between the divine rights of kings and the divine rights of man must some time come to life-and-death combat.

Always He was a man, heroic. He dared tell the mighty ones the truth about themselves and the world. He insisted upon going to Jerusalem where His enemies plotted His death. Single handed and with His whip of cords He drove the speculators out of the temple. He fought entrenched privilege and caste from the day He preached His first sermon in Nazareth to the "poor and broken hearted and blind and enslaved" until His enemies had His back against the cross. He never was a slacker, and from Bethlehem to Calvary He was a virile man, of the people and for the people.

I know that He said "Love your enemies." This Nation has not gone to war singing a hymn of hate. It is not hatred that fires the bullet to kill the family watchdog when it has gone mad and threatens the lives of friends and neighbors. The "mad dog of Europe" must be stopped in his career of death and woe, and it is not hate that inspires the marchers under the Stars and Stripes who are destined to stop it.

I know that He said "Bless them that curse you. Do good to them that hate you." And I maintain that those who will secure the greatest blessings from American victory in this war will be the German peoples. No greater evil could come to the subjects of the German Kaiser than to have this war lord triumphant, to carry still further his ideas of subjection and enslavement. No greater good can come to them than the destruction of the shackles of militarism which have bound them and to set them free to stand upright, to work out their own destiny unmenaced by a ruthless despot.

No; America's cause to-day is that of humanity, and it is the cause of Christ. Men are giving their lives for His cause in bloody trenches, even upon bloody crosses, to-day. The world may be saved "somewhere in France" just as well as in Jerusalem.

Harold Bell Wright, the well-known novelist and a minister of the Gospel of Christ, has expressed his views in a splendid way. He has no doubt as to what the Master would do to-day in America. Here is what he says:

> That Jesus, a citizen of this Christian Nation to-day, hearing the call that has come to us in the name of Christian rights and Christian liberty, could put His sword in the hands of His fellow citizens and refuse to offer Himself is unthinkable. If we accept Jesus in His own words as one who has brought us a sword, then we can not refuse Him as one who would, if need be, carry a sword. In the light of His life and death for humanity, in the light of His teaching, which centuries ago kindled the fire of this war and gave to our Nation the strength and vitality of its Government, it is easier to see the Man of Galilee in the trenches, shoulder to shoulder with His comrades who have drawn the sword of human liberty, than it is to imagine Him skulking at home under the pretext that He does not believe in war.

Mr. Chairman, I have met with another class of opponents of America in the prosecution of this war. They insist that our entrance was due to the influence of munition makers, bankers, financiers, and profiteers. The fact is that the advocacy of war by this class of profiteers was the mightiest obstacle to our participation. They did not dominate public sentiment; they rather thwarted it. It was the intelligent citizenship, those who saw facts clearly, those who realized where we were bound and how to get there, that willed American participation. The average American is true to the ideals of America, and the inspiring response the citizenship has made to every appeal shows the depth of their patriotism.

The profiteering class in America has never been deemed to be idiotic. And yet they had much to lose by our entrance into war. The industrial establishments were running night and day making supplies for the belligerent nations. They were getting any prices they asked and were not interfered with by their own Government. Profits and dividends were soaring beyond all their dreams. Do you think they did not realize that America's entrance into war would turn their production into other directions and under the absolute control of the Government? Do you think they could hope to pile up profits when dealing with the Government direct, as they did when dealing with foreign nations?

I am sure they did not know how far America would go in dealing with them under war conditions, but they did know that some of their golden winnings would be lost. As a matter of fact, the war has made possible methods of dealings with monopoly and big business which would have been impossible in time of peace. Food control, fuel control, Government operation of railroads, excess profits and corporation taxes, all these have come through the war, and their beneficial effects will not be lost when the war is over.

Make no mistake. It is not the profiteer who will profit in the long run from this war. It will be the common manhood, those who, according to Charles M. Schwab, are the "working classes, who are going to control the governments of the world in the future." In this case, at least, he is a true prophet. Out of this war will grow conditions which will make it impossible to produce one multimillionaire and at the same time a multitude of workers striving all their lives in vain attempt to secure an income sufficient to provide the necessaries of life for themselves and children and to lay aside a little for the days of old age. No, this war is not for the profiteer; it is for Americans.

Mr. Chairman, shall I mention those opponents of America who claim to be Americans and yet say that they hope and pray for the success of Germany? If there be one of these who are sincere, God pity him, for he is the most contemptible creature on earth. Here is a mighty conflict for the very existence of America; a conflict for the future of every liberty-loving nation on earth; a war to liberate the subject peoples of the Kaiser; a war in which perhaps millions of American boys will be exposed to death-dealing bullets. God forgive the wretch who stabs us in the back now, for I never can.

Let us admit that some of our citizens came from Germany. Is that not a reason why they should stand by the land which welcomed them rather than the land that turned them away? Suppose an orphan child has been driven out by abusive relations and is taken into the home of a generous, great-hearted man. He makes the child a member of his family, giving it every advantage and opportunity possessed by his own children. He cares for it tenderly, sees that it has every chance for advancement until it comes to manhood, making good and rising to honorable position in life.

Then suppose that one of the relatives who casts that child off in the days of helplessness and need should assault the foster father without cause. Would it not be a cowardly and contemptible thing for that child, now become a man, to stand limply aside and never lift a finger to protect the man who befriended him?

But how should we describe the treachery if that man joined with the assailant and helped him beat down his benefactor? Such action would be more than cowardice; it would be fiendish ingratitude and unpardonable treason.

Mr. Chairman, I maintain that those who have come here to find the freedom and safety which could not be secured in their fatherland owe America the deepest gratitude. This country received them with open arms, welcomed them as comrades, and gave them all the advantages of the native born.

Now, when brutal assailants come dealing deadly blows at the Nation that sheltered them, they must not even stand coward-like aside. They must not join with the foe in his attack. They must fight for their real home and country. Here is their one allegiance, and there can be no other.

And if there be any who are so ungrateful and so treacherous as to stand by the land which cast them off against the land that gave them a sheltered home, the sooner they are put on board ship and sent across submarine-infested seas to the land of their choice, the better it will be for all concerned. No compromise is possible here. The viper has been warmed in the bosom and it has tried to strike. No further opportunity shall be given.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in taking up these different viewpoints of those who must be classed as anti-Americans to-day, I have tried to show the arguments they advance with apparent serious purpose. I have shown how false their sophistry, how shallow their reasoning.

I have not touched the case of those rattlesnakes of menace, those spies, who for money would strike deadly blows on behalf of Prussia at the heart of America.

I admit that I can not speak calmly of them. Their treason is a peril of the darkness. It is a menace of the mask. They mingle freely with patriotic citizens, seeking information, and then slink off to the enemy, pointing out the weak places and advising the action for the undoing of those with whom they have just fraternized. No more despicable creature lives on earth than the Prussian spy. He concocts his evil coldly, deliberately. I might excuse the murderer who in a moment of frenzied passion slays his neighbor. His crime is not so heinous as the calm, scheming villainy of the man who would pretend friendship in war time for the purpose of betrayal.

Our ships, our lives, our factories, our fortifications, our soldiers are in peril from these paid enemies. Realizing their power for evil and the depth of their infamy, I counsel no argument with them. The firing squad or the hangman's noose should settle with them. I maintain that every effort of the Government should be bent to run these spies to earth and that everyone caught should be publicly executed.

Months ago I introduced a bill providing the death penalty for any spy guilty of conveying information to the enemy to be used against the United States. Such a bill should have been enacted into law long ago as a necessary act of American self-defense.

Mr. Chairman, there is a German propaganda in this country, and I have tried to point out some of the insidious arguments which are being used in its spread, sometimes by American born, who are utterly unconscious that they are playing Prussia's game and gravely endangering the cause of their own country.

We need an American propaganda to counteract these hidden and sinister influences. Let the truth be made known to every American that this Nation is engaged in its noblest emprise and that her triumph is absolutely essential to the future liberty and happiness and prosperity of everyone of us in this country. Every effort to impede the steps necessary imperil that future. United efforts in helping America move forward swiftly and mightily make certain a future worthy of this oldest and greatest democracy.

This is the highest duty of every American who loves his country and desires it to retain its place of honor among the free nations of the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], the chairman of the committee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, does that include the two amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments were offered at the same time, and it includes both amendments.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question.

In line 10, on page 1, it says:

Affiliated with any organization that entertains, teaches, or advocates the overthrow by force or violence.

Now, reading that, as in this language, "Any organization that entertains the overthrow by force or violence," it seems to me that that does not quite express the idea that is contained in the following language of the section and the following section. You do not entertain the overthrow by force or violence.

Mr. BURNETT. "Or that entertains or teaches disbelief." Where is it the gentleman is reading?

Mr. WALSH. Lines 10 and 11. You entertain or teach a disbelief, or you entertain opposition, but you could hardly be said to entertain the overthrow.

Mr. BURNETT. "Aliens who are members of or affiliated with any organization that entertains, teaches, or advocates the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all forms of law, or that entertains or teaches disbelief." That might be more grammatical, but that is the language of the law, I will say to my friend.

Mr. WALSH. Is that the language of the present act?

Mr. BURNETT. I think so.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not find any such language in the present act.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It was added in the present act.

Mr. BURNETT. The criticism of the gentleman is grammatically correct, but I will see if it is not in the present act. I read:

Persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, or of all forms of law, or who disbelieve in or are opposed to organized government, or who advocate the assassination of public officials, or who advocate or teach the unlawful destruction of property; persons who are members of or affiliated with any organization entertaining or teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government, or who advocate or teach the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers.

Perhaps the criticism of the gentleman is technically correct. What suggestion would the gentleman make in order to obviate any possible confusion?

Mr. WALSH. I think the word "believes" should be substituted for the word "entertain"—any organization that "believes in or teaches or advocates the overthrow."

Mr. BURNETT. The criticism of the gentleman is as to the incorrect use of the word "entertain," as I understand. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] suggests "entertains a belief in, teaches, or advocates."

Mr. WALSH. Yes. That would correct it.

Mr. BURNETT. I think that is a very good suggestion, and I will agree to it.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman offer an amendment?

Mr. BURNETT. I will offer it. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment suggested be agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. No amendment has been reported. The gentleman has the privilege of reporting it by unanimous consent.

Mr. BURNETT. It should be "entertains a belief in, teaches, or advocates."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. There should be the word "or" inserted after "belief in."

Mr. BURNETT. It is separated by a comma.

Mr. SHERLEY. It does not need to be in the disjunctive.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BURNETT: Amend, page 1, line 10, after the word "entertains," by inserting a comma and the words "a belief in."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I understand the amendment adopted applies on line 10. Should it not also apply to page 2?

Mr. BURNETT. Where is that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It reads now, in line 10 of page 1, "entertains a belief in, teaches, or advocates the overthrow by force," and then, on the next page, "or that advocates or teaches."

Mr. BURNETT. I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That any alien who shall, after he has been excluded and deported or arrested and deported in pursuance of the provisions of this act, thereafter return to or enter the United States or attempt to return to or to enter the United States shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not more than five years; and shall, upon the termination of such imprisonment, be taken into custody, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor, and deported in the manner provided in the immigration act of February 5, 1917.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WALSH. I think this is proper punishment to inflict upon an anarchist who comes to this country and remains here and then is deported; but I wondered what position an alien would be in who had possibly unwittingly joined an organization and had been deported, and when he found that by joining that organization he had brought down that punishment on his head he had really and sincerely reformed and had cast aside all affiliation with that organization and had revised his belief and his practices. He possibly may have left property in this country or a family. Now, if he should attempt to reenter the country there would be no opportunity, as I understand it, for him to show that he was no longer anarchistic in sentiment. The mere fact that he was found guilty on attempting to return to the country would make him amenable to this penalty, and, further, after he had served his sentence and was seeking to return, after he gets out the Secretary of Labor can again deport him.

The purpose of my inquiry is to ascertain whether there is in existing law or in the proposed law anything that would permit a man who might have been an anarchist when he was deported, but who had sincerely reformed and possibly had proven it in the country to which he had been deported, and had been during the period of his deportation a loyal supporter of that Government—is there anything that would permit him to come back into the country under the existing law or under this proposed law?

Mr. BURNETT. I think not; and I do not think we should adopt anything that would, because it would open the door to too many cases of pretended reformation. There is a way in which it can be reached, and that is by Executive clemency. If it should be found that that was true, I have no doubt it would be a proper case for Executive clemency, and I believe that is the only way.

Mr. WALSH. Executive clemency can not suspend section 3 of this act, certainly.

Mr. BURNETT. It does not prevent the pardon of one guilty of a felony. The President would have the right to extend clemency, and when he did so the question of deportation would be with the department having authority to deport.

Mr. WALSH. It says he shall be taken into custody and, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor, deported in the manner provided. That is mandatory. I apprehend that there may be very few; and probably the doctrine, "Once an anarchist, always an anarchist," prevails with this class of people. But I wondered if there might not be cases where men who had joined organizations innocently in this country and, not appreciating their beliefs or practices, had been deported, and when they realized the punishment imposed upon them have become good, loyal, sincere citizens. You might part them from their families here and send them back from their relatives. If a man is able to show all that, should there not be some way in which he could prove his loyalty and the fact that he has cast aside his former anarchistic beliefs and practices?

Mr. BURNETT. I feel that would be very difficult to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. I just wondered whether the committee had taken the matter into consideration at all.

Mr. BURNETT. Really, the question was not suggested. The view I would take of it would be that such cases would be very rare and would perhaps never occur.

Mr. WALSH. I believe this would be a proper punishment for those whom it seeks to reach. Then, if they reenter the country, they ought to be punished, and after they are punished they should be deported.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Take the case of a Finn who was born in Finland with revolution in his soul, and he comes here and joins a revolutionary society, and goes back to his own country, writhing in the throes of revolution, and he finds out what a revolution really is, and seeing that, he is reformed and wants to come back here again. Does the gentleman think he ought then to have the right to come back to the United States?

Mr. WALSH. No; those are not the people I am speaking of.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. He would see a revolution going on, and seeing the disastrous results of it he would say, "I will go back to a free country where there will not be a revolution."

Mr. WALSH. That might be so in such a case.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. At the same time how are we going to uproot men of that kind, who think we ought to have revolutions and keep them out of the United States? Ought we not to send them out and keep them out?

Mr. WALSH. They ought to be sent out and kept out, but I was thinking of the case of a man who might have expressed a belief in some of these iniquitous practices, and who had been punished for it by deportation; who, after he had been deported, and had remained in his own country for two or three years with time for reflection, should come to the conclusion that he was wrong, and he assisted in putting down these people and wiping out such practices. In such a case possibly it might not be a wise thing to punish him if he attempted to return to this country.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MEEKER. Could not the executive parole apply to a case of that kind?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; the chairman of the committee suggested that that would reach it, but it would seem rather harsh to impose a sentence of a felony——

Mr. MEEKER. I do not know that we should apply rosewater to fellows who are trying to destroy this Government.

Mr. WALSH. I am not talking about the man who is trying to destroy the Government at all. He has been punished for having those views, and has reformed his ideas and may make a most loyal citizen after having suffered punishment for having been anarchistic in former years.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 2. I was following the reading, but my attention was temporarily diverted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to return to section 2. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I should like to make an inquiry of the gentleman in charge of the bill. Is there not a provision of law now by which an alien who has been naturalized, and thus has ceased to be an alien, who then manifests decided anarchistic views and characteristics, may have his citizenship taken away from him?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes. I adverted to that a moment ago. We have a statute that provides for the revocation of naturalization papers for fraud. In a New Jersey case, where a man was naturalized some 20 or 25 years ago, I think, and was haled before the court on a motion to annul his naturalization papers, the court held that the naturalization papers should be annulled on the ground of fraud. The court in that case decided that the evidence was such as to convince him that the man had a fraudulent intent at the time he acquired those papers, and the court annulled his naturalization. Similar action is being taken in a number of other cases; but there is no law which provides that merely on account of a seditious or disloyal declaration the court is authorized ipso facto to denaturalize the citizen by annulling his papers. It is only authorized on the idea that there was fraud in the acquisition of the papers.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If I may be permitted, I would like to say to the gentleman that, in my opinion, nothing more salutary could be put into the law than a provision that any man who has become a citizen and thereafter entertains, believes in, or preaches such doctrines as are forbidden in paragraph 1 of this bill shall upon proof thereof have his naturalization taken from him. Without mentioning the name of the nationality, I should like to state that in various localities in the United States there are people of a nationality almost 90 per cent disloyal to this Government for reasons that really have nothing whatever to do with this Government. There was a time for many years when these men could file on public land, making homestead entries on their first papers. I have received any number of letters from constituents saying that so-and-so and so-and-so are guilty of disloyal conduct of the worst character. It is hard to prove it, although there is no question about the facts. These people are resident upon the public lands, and have their first papers, or have their full citizenship papers, and are going to prove up. At heart they are not American citizens at all. They have no American spirit in their souls. It seems to me it is a serious menace. Perhaps they never can become true American citizens. Let us go a step further. A great many men over the country have taken out their second papers and have become citizens. Since this war began, because of conditions that have nothing whatever to do with the United States, they have developed an antagonism to this Government and a spirit of hostility that is very serious. Now, I would take away the papers from every one of those fellows quicker than a flash; and I have been advised by courts having to do with naturalization in an area where there are 20 or 30 different nationalities living that the most salutary influence in the world is for some of those fellows to believe, whether it is true or not, that after they get their papers they have got to toe the mark or they are going to lose them.

There are many sections of this country, which we do not need to particularize by name, where whole communities are largely made up of people who have come from countries where popular self-government has never existed, a majority of whom are socialistically inclined, if not anarchistic. I know several places outside of my own State, and one or two inside of my own State, where it took the utmost effort on the part of certain people to prevent the red flag from being carried alone by a majority of the citizens of the community on their Sunday marches, and the fight was to compel them to carry the American flag along with the red flag. Finally one day at one place a good big Irishman got out in the middle of the street with a double-barreled shotgun and settled that particular parade right quick. These are conditions that are serious. I believe you could reach the whole thing if you could write into the law squarely—I believe we have a right to do it—that any person who, after he becomes a citizen, is convicted of any of the things that would disqualify him from coming into this country as an alien shall have his citizenship taken away.

Mr. BURNETT. I have no doubt that Congress has the right to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURNETT. There is no constitutional trouble in the way of a law of this kind. It would not be ex post facto, because they decided in the Two hundred and twenty-fifth United States, Johannessen's case:

> In affirming the judgment setting aside Johannessen's certificate of naturalization, in answer to the appellant's contention that section 15 of the act of 1916 is retrospective and, consequently, unconstitutional as an ex post facto law within the prohibition of Article I, section 9, of the Constitution, the court said: "The ex post facto provision of the Constitution is confined to laws affecting punishment for crime and has no relation to retrospective legislation of any other description."

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Section 2 relates to an alien. It provides:

> That any alien who, at any time after entering the United States, is found to have been at the time of entry, or to have become thereafter, a member of any one of the classes of aliens enumerated in section 1 of this act, shall, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor, be taken into custody and deported in the manner provided in the immigration act of February 5, 1917. The provisions of this section shall be applicable to the classes of aliens mentioned in this act irrespective of the time of their entry into the United States.

I beg to inquire if a man who has taken out his first papers and yet not taken out second papers can in legal parlance be called an alien?

Mr. BURNETT. Absolutely. I asked that question of a representative of the Department of Justice when this bill was before our committee. I investigated it when the alien slacker bill was up and the decisions of the court all hold that he is not a citizen until he has perfected his citizenship by securing his full naturalization papers.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, the case goes further than that and has in one or two instances, perhaps, worked a hardship. A woman, an American citizen, married such an alien who had taken out his first papers, believing that that made him a citizen but which did not make him a citizen, and thereby she becomes herself an alien within the ruling that has been laid down touching the registration of aliens, and she is required along with her husband to register.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. How about the constitutional provision which says that any person born in the United States and subject to its jurisdiction, and so forth?

Mr. SHERLEY. The Department of Justice requires registration of an alien enemy, and a woman born in America who marries the alien enemy, a resident of this country, must also register.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think as a matter of public policy that is a wise precaution, but I should question whether the legal rights of the woman would be determined in that way.

Mr. BURNETT. The case of McKenzie, in the Two hundred and thirty-ninth United States, settled the question of the woman expatriating herself by marrying a foreigner, and they held straight out that there was nothing in the statute which violated the Constitution.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. These responses entirely settle the point I had in mind in reference to a person who had taken out his first papers. I wanted to make sure that he could be deported.

Mr. BURNETT. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I want to congratulate the committee for its wisdom in producing this bill. I think it is timely, and I sincerely trust that the committee will take the additional step and provide for denaturalization of men who, subsequent to their admission, by reason of their objections to the Government, are not proper persons to be citizens of this country.

Mr. BURNETT. I assure the gentleman that the committee will very carefully go into it. There is a bill now pending before our committee, introduced by the able gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] along the line the gentleman suggests.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Would the gentleman consider an amendment to that effect to this bill?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not think it ought to be put upon this bill, because we have agreed with the Senate committee on the immediate report of the bill as it is, and I am afraid of hurtful delay if we should amend it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. In deference to the gentleman I will not offer an amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I am interested in the case that the gentleman cites in Two hundred and thirty-ninth United States. Does that case go so far as to hold that a woman expatriates herself if she marries an alien, even in such a State where they have a complete right of suffrage?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; they do not require full citizenship in some States to exercise the right of suffrage. That is a State function. In some States if she marries an alien with first papers she might be allowed to vote. I believe in the State of Indiana aliens are not required to have even the first papers to vote. That is the right of suffrage which may be entirely disassociated from the question of citizenship obtained under the Federal law.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman have the citation of this case so that he could put it in the RECORD?

Mr. BURNETT. The McKenzie case is in the Two hundred and thirty-ninth United States, page 299. I have not the case before me.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I am very much in favor of any legislation that will purge the country of anarchy. I want to know something about section 2. I notice that it provides—

That any alien who, at any time after entering the United States, is found to have been at the time of entry, or to have become thereafter, a member of any one of the classes of aliens enumerated in section 1 of this act, shall, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor, be taken into custody and deported in the manner provided in the immigration act of February 5, 1917.

I would like to know if there ought not to be some provision for them in the event you can not deport them. Can you find a place to which to deport these people?

Mr. BURNETT. That has been passed upon by the department. They have a right to hold them until they can deport them. I want to state that there were cases brought to the attention of the committee by the department in which the parties were not alien enemies, all of them. There were cases of Belgians, Italians, and other cases, and we could certainly reach the allied countries and we could reach others at some time. They could be held in some way until they could be deported. That is done every day; they are held until they are deported.

Mr. LINTHICUM. What I have in mind is that if the anarchist alien is from one of our allies we do not want to dump him upon those people, to the injury of their Government, and if he is from our enemies we can not deport him. It seems to me there ought to be some way to deal with him, and to deal with him drastically. The great complaint has been that we treat these people too well. We are treating all of these people inimical to our Government much too well. I have a number of letters complaining about the treatment of people not in sympathy with our Government. I think it is high time we were doing something more drastic than we have been doing. I can not see how you are going to deport them if they are from our allies, for, as I say, we do not want to send that kind of a man back there to disrupt that country, and if they are from our enemies we can not send them back.

Mr. BURNETT. Then the logic of the gentleman would be that we had better keep them to tear our country to pieces than to send them back for some one else to take care of.

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; I do not want to do that. I want to do something to prevent their tearing our country up and also tearing the country of our allies up. I want him dealt with drastically, or turned over to the authorities of his native country so they can deal him proper punishment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would not notice be given to the foreign country to whom these men were deported so that that foreign country might deal with them. Suppose a man came from Italy and we deported him, would we not notify Italy that an anarchist was coming back to her shores?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think it would be necessary; but Italy might not want to receive him.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would it not be up to Italy to take care of him?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; but supposed she refused to do it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He could not then return to this country; that is sure. And Italy would have the problem on her hands instead of our having it upon our hands.

Mr. LINTHICUM. What I want to do is to get rid of their activities permanently. We have been dealing with this subject for a pretty long time and our people are complaining that we are not drastic enough; that we are not dealing with these fellows as they ought to be dealt with. I get constant complaints respecting the leniency with which we are treating them.

Mr. BURNETT. The law already takes care of that.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will not the gentleman cite that law?

Mr. BURNETT. It would follow when they arrest a man under a warrant of the Secretary of Labor for the purpose of deportation, even in time of peace, if he can not deport him immediately he will have to keep him somewhere till he can. They would not just simply turn him loose.

Mr. LINTHICUM. How do they keep them? The complaint of our people is that we are keeping them too well.

Mr. BURNETT. Your commissioner of immigration in Baltimore might be able to give the gentleman some information as to how they treat them.

By unanimous consent Mr. LINTHICUM was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It is high time we were realizing that the doctrine that "He who is not with me is against me" is just as true to-day as it was nearly 2,000 years ago, and is just as applicable to nations as it is to individuals.

The patriotic people of this country are straining every nerve and energy, every resource and property, in the prosecution of this great war in Europe for the defense of democracy and the freedom of the people. The American people are slow to anger and slow to enter wars, but when once they enter they are a determined and forceful people. They have entered this war with the determination that autocracy shall be banished from the face of the globe and that it shall not stalk its hideous form through future history. To this end they are ready to make every sacrifice and to endure every hardship, not only for the benefit of the present generation but for those who are to come after us.

We are the trustees, as it were, of this great democracy which was handed down to us by our forefathers, and it is the duty of the present generation to hand it down to those to follow untarnished by any act and with a power equal to or greater than when we received it. Its doctrines and principles are a precious heritage, and they are now in the keeping of the present generation.

The man or organization who teaches anarchy in opposition to the American Government, who endeavors to undermine its operations and to overthrow its form of government, is perhaps the greatest enemy we can have, and should be dealt with as an arch enemy of the country. Our people have complained for some time that the Government was not drastic enough in these cases. I know that the Government is doing everything within its power to put down false doctrines and to eliminate the enemies of our country, but what the Government needs is more stringent laws, such as the one we are passing to-day, so that they may carry into effect the wishes and aims of the American people.

Our forefathers early in the history of this country found that it was necessary to pass and enforce stringent laws that the Government should not be overthrown, and that they might prosecute the war in the interest of our people. To-day after more than 100 years we find ourselves in the same position, and that the melting pot, which we thought was in full operation, had not so amalgamated our people that we were one and inseparable, but had failed to assimilate certain elements, and among these are the anarchists of this country, who are endeavoring by their doctrines and teachings to overthrow democracy.

I realize the enemies of our country are not large in proportion with our population, but the great difficulty is that our enemies devote their time and attention in their teachings and practices among those who are least able to refute them. They attempt to spread their doctrines among the population least educated in democracy and the aim of the American Government. They teach among those who are mostly foreign born and have not had the advantages of being born and reared under the Stars and Stripes and understanding the principles and doctrines laid down by our forefathers in the Constitution of our country. It is this same teaching, limited and small in the beginning, gradually growing and extending, which brought down the great Government of Russia at a time when we most needed it, and it would be criminal negligence on the part of Congress not to pass this measure and eliminate the anarchists and anarchy from America.

The prairie fire often starts from the embers left by a traveler in his march through the country or a live match carelessly thrown aside, but fanned by the gentle breezes and later by the swift winds it gathers force and spreads devastation among miles of country, doing damage to thousands of homes and spreading want throughout an entire section. The teachings of the anarchists may begin in some small, obscure, and unnoticed home, gradually increasing among the people of that class until it spreads and devours their reason, and great governments are overthrown like the mighty monarchy of Russia.

The American Government, the greatest democracy which the world has ever known, has granted great liberty and opportunity to all the people of the globe. They have been invited to come and enjoy the great resources and free Government of a liberty loving people. The great bulk of those who have come have been melted in the melting pot and become true and sympathetic American citizens, but there is left another class which has not been assimilated, which has not appreciated the great opportunities given them nor endeavored to learn the principles and doctrines laid down by our forefathers for which they shed their blood and gave up their lives. They have not desired to become American citizens, rather they would remain alien enemies in order that they may call upon their own Governments in times of peace for consideration should they violate the laws of America. These are the men who, inspired by false doctrines who do not believe in the rule of the people under a constitution properly promulgated, but prefer to teach a false doctrine among the people, alluring those in sympathy with their teachings and interesting those who are too ignorant to understand the Government under which they are living.

I am glad that Congress has rapidly bestowed upon the administration full power and authority to deal with all cases not in sympathy with our Government and the prosecution of this great war in Europe. The patriotic people of this country are determined that these anarchists and aliens who are against us should be dealt with with a firm hand. They should, Mr. Speaker, be dealt with with the mailed fist. They are more dangerous in undermining our Government than many bullets on the battle fields of Flanders. The propaganda which they spread caused the downfall of Russia in the prosecution of this war. It nearly caused the overrunning of Italy and her elimination from this great conflict. It has spread to the fertile soil of Mexico, where they have promised great things and would like to put them into practice, and now they are endeavoring to extend their tentacles into the fair fields and homes of America, and I am firm in the belief that there is no punishment which can be meted out to them which would be too great for their infamy and doubledealing.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words for the purpose of asking a question. Section 3 gives the United States the right to arrest an alien after he has been excluded and deported and then returns. The alien who returns to the United States is here. Where do you get the jurisdiction to arrest an alien who attempts to return? When he attempts to return he is not in the United States; he only is attempting to return. An alien may be near the Canadian border, within 50 feet of the line. United States authorities can not arrest him in Canada. He must be in the United States, be over the border, before he can be arrested. You can not arrest him because he attempts to enter our territory.

Mr. BURNETT. He can be arrested in the port of New York. Of course you can not arrest him until you get your hands on him.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. You can not arrest him outside of the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. BURNETT. Suppose he is on the train coming here, and he gets right to the border, where the sheriff can lay his hands on him——

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. He is in the United States; he is not attempting to return, for then he is in the United States. What power have you to arrest a man not in the United States?

Mr. BURNETT. You can not.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. The United States has no authority to arrest an alien while attempting to enter.

Mr. BURNETT. Well, of course, it is catching before hanging. I think that is the complete answer.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent that all debate on this bill—I believe the reading has been concluded—I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania has yielded the floor?

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. I want to ask the chairman if this clause——

Mr. BURNETT. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the bill may be concluded in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate on this bill and all amendments thereto be concluded in 10 minutes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire whether or not I could have five minutes of that time to speak on the bill and another little matter connected with it?

Mr. BURNETT. The other little matters take up the time——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will speak on the bill.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. Is not all debate on this section concluded under the rule? There are no amendments pending.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no amendment now pending.

Mr. RAKER. All debate on the pro forma amendments have been exhausted.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I have a serious amendment to section 3, which I would like to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair state to the gentleman from California that there is no amendment now pending, but all debate has not closed until all amendments are offered.

Mr. RAKER. Nobody offered an amendment, and therefore I propounded that question.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The request for unanimous agreement to close debate is pending, to which the gentleman from Michigan reserved the right to object.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ROGERS. The time is exhausted, and I have offered an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] asks unanimous consent to conclude all debate on the bill and the pending amendments in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, I would like to have five minutes. However, let the Chair put the question first.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I object if it is necessary to protect my right to discuss briefly my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object or not?

Mr. ROGERS. I object.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the bill and amendments close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate on the bill and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to inquire if I can have five minutes of that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. As I understand it, unanimous consent was asked to go back to section 2, and that consent was granted, and section 2 is now under consideration. Now, I have an amendment to propose to that section which I think is vital and important, and I do not see the wisdom of shutting off debate in this way before those who are here have an opportunity to express their views. I want to ask the gentleman if he will not at this point extend the time or permit me to submit my amendment to section 2?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not really a parliamentary question.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I ask the gentleman to enlarge the scope of the debate so as to allow a little more time than 10 minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. Does the gentleman mean to offer an amendment?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes, sir; to section 2.

Mr. BURNETT. I would be willing to allow an enlargement of the time so that the gentleman would have an opportunity to discuss the amendment. I suggest 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman amends his motion by asking that all debate close in 20 minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which is at the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 2, line 25, after the word "years" insert:

"Provided, That, in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, he may be taken into custody and deported."

Strike out, in line 25, page 2, and line 1, page 3, the words "and shall upon termination of such imprisonment," and insert, beginning with the sentence, "he shall upon the conclusion of any term of imprisonment."

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment purely in the hope that it may slightly improve an admirable bill. The provision as it stands in the bill is that an alien who has been deported under the act and who hereafter shall return to the United States shall be deemed guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than five years, at the end of which time he shall be again deported.

I think that in ninety-five cases out of a hundred, perhaps in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, that provision as it stands will do justice and is the right way to reach the offender whom we all want to reach in the most vigorous way possible. But I think in the occasional case it may be unfortunate that the Secretary of Labor shall be obliged to put the man on trial, convict him, imprison him, and then deport him. It strikes me that in the occasional case we want to get rid of the man first and not afterwards. We want to purge our shores instantly of that man who has come here and who ought to be sent back forthwith to his own country.

That is the sole purpose of my amendment. I gathered from the suggestion of the chairman of the committee when I questioned him during his own remarks that he was not wholly out of sympathy with it. It merely gives the Secretary of Labor discretion in the occasional case to get rid immediately of one of these creatures that we do not want around.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman believe in the policy that has been adopted by some of the courts—that where a vagrant is arrested, if you please, they give him food and shelter over night and then turn him loose and let him go on to the next place, and so on? Do you not believe every community, county, and State ought to enforce the law and provide a penalty and convict him and make him serve?

Mr. ROGERS. That does not present the slightest analogy to my amendment. We are dealing with a man who comes unlawfully to the shores of the United States from another country. It ought to be within the discretion of the United States, through the Secretary of Labor, to throw him out right away and not be obliged under the law to convict him of a felony, imprison him, and then throw him out.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. The purpose of this law is, however, to prevent his return. If the law remains as it is and he knows he will be imprisoned, he is not so apt to return as he will be if the Secretary adopts another policy of returning him again.

Mr. ROGERS. I said twice during the debate that in 99 per cent of the cases the bill, as it stands, works exact justice. Occasionally we may want to make an exception, and under the bill as it now stands we can not do it.

Mr. DOWELL. But will not your exception now encourage his return?

Mr. ROGERS. Not at all, because that man will know he has not more than one chance in a hundred to get by without a term of imprisonment.

Mr. DOWELL. But he will know the exception, and if the exception is ever made you will only encourage him to return.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not think it is very much of an exception when it is a ninety-nine to one likelihood that he must serve a prison term, especially when the one chance in a hundred lands him back where he started, having had to pay his ocean passage both ways.

Mr. RAKER. The very exception that the gentleman makes would indicate that that man, because of his viciousness, ought to be punished for a while and then sent back, instead of simply being sent back across the water as a lesson.

Mr. ROGERS. Why should we be obliged to punish a man if we do not want to? Why should we be obliged to fill up our penal institutions and support that man for four or five years if we do not want to? Why not let the Secretary of Labor have discretion?

Mr. RAKER. Because he is a criminal at heart, and we should not punish him in one State and send him into another.

Mr. ROGERS. Is the gentleman so tender of the country from which a man of that kind may come that he insists that for that country's welfare we should punish him here instead of sending him back where he belongs?

Mr. RAKER. No; give him his medicine and then send him back. That is what I contend for.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to section 2.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree to return to section 2, but I will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be some misunderstanding as to just what our situation is. I understood that we went back to the consideration of section 2 by unanimous consent, and that was obviously done because a number of gentlemen discussed it, and I tried repeatedly to get the attention of the Chair in order to offer an amendment. If the chairman of the committee claims the parliamentary right to exclude my amendment, of course I shall not offer it; but I may at least submit to the judgment of the chairman the wisdom of the amendment and ask the House to consider whether or not it is not best for us to go slow in enacting a bill of the importance of this measure.

I have no sympathy with anarchists or those who hold anarchistic views. I think that the man who is against government should not receive any consideration at the hands of government. But there are cases where a man experiences a change of heart. Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] made a criticism of section 3, that we are now on, apparently, which shows that the section as drafted is likely to do great injustice in certain situations, where men, after having been tried by a court and found to be anarchists have been excluded from the country and then come back, but come back educated and reformed as to their views on anarchism. It would be an injustice to exclude these men, and yet under this act they may be excluded.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman will pardon me. I have only five minutes and I want to proceed to the meat of the matter.

But in section 3 you have a judicial determination. In section 2, as framed, the law provides that any alien who at any time after entering the United States is found to have been at the time of entry a member of any one of the classes of aliens, and so forth, he may be deported; so that after the lapse of 10 years, if some one frames an information against him for personal or vindictive reasons and claims that he was an anarchist when he entered the country, that man may be brought up on the warrant of the Secretary of Labor and excluded from the country. It leaves no latitude for any change of heart, no change in his opinions, and I do not think that that is the purpose of this body. I do not think that that is our intention.

How many men having that character, ignorant and biased, do we get in this country every year, men filled with foreign notions, inimical to our institutions, but yet under our beneficent educational processes and our social intercourse alter their views? They may have been anarchists when they entered the country, but they have experienced a change of heart, and you are opening the door here to their malicious prosecution. I submit very earnestly to the chairman of this committee, before he railroads this matter through this House, that we should consider deliberately the amendment that I have sent to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that by unanimous consent section 2 was returned to, but not for the purpose of offering an amendment. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] stated, I think, that he had been out of the House and wished to return for the purpose of obtaining information.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, my amendment briefly was this, to strike out the words on line 10, "to have been at the time of entry, or," leaving the section read, "That any alien who, at any time after entering the United States, is found to have become a member of any one of the classes of aliens enumerated," and so forth. I think the provision is just as strong in the proposed form with the words in question excluded.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may ask unanimous consent to return to the section for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I do so, Mr. Chairman, taking advantage of your courtesy.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to return to section 2 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. BURNETT. That would not enlarge the time of debate, would it, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes have been consumed. There remain 10 minutes yet. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. DOWELL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RAKER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, whether we are at war or at peace, this is correct legislation for good citizenry of the United States, and it ought to be on the statute books. I compliment the chairman of this committee and the whole committee upon this kind of legislation.

I remember the parting words of our esteemed and distinguished colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN] when he left. He told us that in the consideration of our legislation during these times we should be cool and deliberate. That has kept ringing in my ears, and I have wondered why it is that there is no Federal legislation or why there has been no congressional action taken or statute put upon our statute books by the Congress of the United States that punishes the mutilation or destruction of our flag. I hear the President say, "Woe to the man or group of men that stand in our way in this day of high resolution." I most fully indorse that utterance and further add it were better for any such a man or groups of men that a millstone be hanged about their necks and they be cast in the depths of the sea. The life of the Nation is at stake. I see the boys wearing the uniform of our country following wherever our flag leads and offering their lives in its defense. The world over the Stars and Stripes is the representative of our Government. The flag is the creature of the Federal statute, yet for punishment for the mutilation of our country's flag we depend upon a little State statute providing a small fine of $5 to $100 or imprisonment in jail not exceeding 90 days. Our colleague says that we must be cool and deliberate. Almost every day we read that somewhere in the Republic the flag has been willfully destroyed or mutilated by some miscreant as an expression of his hatred and contempt for our Government, although the lives of the young manhood of our country are being offered for its protection. I wonder how a person can witness that and keep cool, especially when there is no Federal law to mete out adequate punishment.

I like this bill, and I wish that an amendment could be made to section 1 by adding after the words "destruction of property" the words "or destruction of the flag of the United States." As I read this bill I see that it applies solely to aliens. It is a good law for every man domiciled in the United States and asking the protection of the flag and the protection of the laws of our country. This is the kind of legislation that counts. Before the Russia Government went to pieces it had a law punishing with 10 years' imprisonment the destruction of the Russian flag. Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Turkey have national laws against the destruction of their flag. When we are passing this kind of legislation it seems to me that with the destruction and mutilation of the American flag, so frequent throughout our country, we should have some law for its protection and severely punishing such a heinous crime. It should not be left wholly to mob law. The spirit of this law points in the right direction. It makes me think of Hale's story of A Man Without a Country, who uttered an oath against his country and never until his dying day was again permitted to see his native land or its flag floating in the blue sky. This bill does not contain all that I wish it did contain, but it is a step in the right direction, and these anarchists and other seditious intriguers, saboteurs, and traitors will meet, in part, their fate under this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word or two in regard to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS]. Apparently he desires to avoid the long delays that will be occasioned by a trial and to give the Secretary of Labor the right to deport immediately if, in his discretion, he deems it wise. When that was first suggested in the general debate I said that I would give it consideration, because it struck me with a good deal of favor; but since that I have conferred with the attorney representing the Department of Labor, and he says that that is already their practice, and that there is nothing in the bill that will prevent that action if they get hold of the man first. If the courts get control of a man first, of course the Secretary of Labor would not desire and ought not to be permitted to take him away from the courts, because if the man is found guilty deportation will follow. But they tell me that it is a frequent practice to deport a man immediately instead of waiting for the action of the courts.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, of course the language of section 3 is that any alien who seeks to return after deportation shall be deemed guilty of a felony.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. It would seem to me that the consequences attendant upon having committed a felony would follow, and that a man would necessarily be taken over by the court and his punishment under the act proceeded with. I will ask the gentleman whether the law officer of the Department of Labor with whom the gentleman talked saw any objection to the proposal in my pending amendment?

Mr. BURNETT. No.

Mr. ROGERS. Does not the gentleman think that in view of the fact that it gives the Secretary of Labor the additional power it may in certain classes of cases work justice, and that it may be desirable to have it included in the law?

Mr. BURNETT. There is this objection, as suggested by a gentleman who discussed it a moment ago: There is danger of that being a sort of a bid or inducement to them to say, "Well, if we can get away with this thing by fooling the Secretary of Labor and staying in, we will take chances on it." But, to my mind, it is not necessary; and we had better not have language in the law that we do not need, because whenever you commence putting in things that are already the law you are in danger of confusing the law itself. For that reason I would much prefer not to consent to the amendment of the gentleman, because it is being worked out in exactly that way by the department at the present time.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. If a man came here in violation of this law and the Secretary of Labor got charge of him and no one filed a complaint under the law charging him with a felony, could not the Secretary of Labor deport him without anyone charging him with a felony?

Mr. BURNETT. The law says absolutely that any alien who shall enter or be found in the United States in violation of this act or any other law of the United States may be deported. That is the language of the present law.

Mr. RAKER. The man having been deported for any of the reasons stated in the bill, if he should try to come back again, ought not the penalty of the law to be inflicted upon him as a warning and an example, so that others would be discouraged from trying to come here who might hope to slip by without detection or punishment? And if you put the man in prison for five years his friends will not try to return. They will stay away.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

On motion of Mr. BURNETT, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARDY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12402) to exclude and expel from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURNETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, Mr. BURNETT, Mr. SMITH of Michigan, and Mr. AUSTIN were given leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

FOURTEENTH AND SUBSEQUENT DECENNIAL CENSUSES.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 11984) making provision for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky calls up the bill H. R. 11984, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a question of order.

Mr. GILLETT. If the gentleman asks unanimous consent I object, and if he calls it up as a privileged bill I want to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts raises the point of order.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11984.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this is not a privileged bill. The Speaker is, I know, perfectly familiar with the precedents and will remember, as I do, the argument and decision of Speaker Henderson on the subject. In making that decision Speaker Henderson indicated that if it was a new question without precedents he would be disposed to rule otherwise, and I think anybody would admit that the mere fact that the Constitution makes it the duty of Congress to provide for a census does not necessarily decide in what way the committee shall bring up that bill. It does not give the chairman of any one committee—the Committee on the Census or any other—the right to bring up any particular bill at any particular time. It really is a matter for Congress to decide by its rules how and in what way a bill should be brought up. The rules would naturally provide for it. It is simply our duty to pass a bill, but not any particular bill at any particular time.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Is there any other committee asking for recognition at this time?

Mr. GILLETT. Not that I know of. However, I will put that aside. I do not raise the question at all that the committee has not jurisdiction. The regular way would be for the House to provide in its rules that the Committee on the Census should have the power to bring up a bill providing for taking the census. It is the duty of Congress under the Constitution to pass appropriation bills for the expenses of the Government; but no one has ever contended that the Appropriation Committees derive their privilege from the Constitution, but it is derived from the rules of the House. So this committee ought to apply for a rule.

But, Mr. Speaker, allowing as I do that precedents determine, that a bill necessary to carry out the provision of the Constitution for an apportionment is privileged, yet that does not govern this case, for this bill is not at all necessary for carrying out the purposes of the Constitution, and stands in an entirely different condition from any bill brought before us in previous years, and for this reason: Until the last census bill was passed Congress has passed a bill each 10 years providing exclusively for that decennial census. But 10 years ago Congress adopted an entirely different practice, as the Speaker is aware. The bill which was passed in 1909 provided for not only taking the Thirteenth Census, but taking of all subsequent censuses. So that to-day on the statute book, and without any additional legislation at all, there is adequate provision for carrying out the constitutional mandate that every 10 years there shall be a census. In my opinion that takes away instantly the reason for the decision of previous Speakers, that it was necessary in order to carry out the edict of the Constitution, because now there is a law on the statute books passed 10 years ago which does carry out the provisions of the Constitution and which has created the permanent Census Bureau with all of the divisions and subdivisions necessary to take the census.

Therefore it seems to me that the reason for the previous decision, which I think the Speaker and everybody else will admit was a very forced construction, and one which ought not to be extended, as Speaker Henderson intimated, has passed away, and when the foundation of that precedent is destroyed, and there is a law in existence already which carries out the provisions of the Constitution, I do not think another bill has privilege under the Constitution. If this is in order, any amendment would be in order at any time, no matter how trivial it might be, for if this is held to be privileged it must be not because it is necessary to carry out the mandate of the Constitution, but simply because it relates to the subject mentioned in the Constitution. I do not see how a bill can be held privileged because of the Constitution unless it is necessary to accomplish the constitutional provision, and inasmuch as such a law is now on the statute books any further legislation should be subject to the ordinary rules of the House and not claim superiority because it is in obedience to the Constitution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit the question of necessity, as suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, has not yet arisen, nor has the question of privilege yet arisen. The gentleman from Kentucky has moved, as I understand, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill. It is up to the House to vote that down or up as it may see fit.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman from Kentucky claims that it is privileged. Unless it is privileged he has no right to make the motion.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Why not?

Mr. GILLETT. Because there is a regular order in this House.

Mr. STAFFORD. The regular order, if anyone demands it, and I made the point of order, is the call of committees, and the call rests with the Committee on Naval Affairs. I demand the regular order so as to bring to a focus the decision as to whether this bill has a privileged status or not.

Mr. GILLETT. I raised that question at the beginning. I said that if it was unanimous consent that was being asked, I objected, and if it was a privileged motion, I wish to argue it. The gentleman from Kentucky claims to offer it as a privileged motion.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly obvious that there are certain gentlemen in the House who want to consume about five or six hours unnecessarily in displaying their capacity to raise and discuss points of order.

If there is any one thing that has been established thoroughly and completely for the last 50 years, it is that the rulings of the Speaker of the House establishing precedent are of equal dignity and rank with the rules of the House themselves. There is an unbroken line of decisions rendered by the different Speakers of this House covering a period of almost a half century consistently holding a bill to provide for a decennial census privileged, with the only exception. In 1910, at a time when the House was virtually in a state of revolt, the former chairman of the Committee on the Census offered an amendment on Calendar Wednesday to a census bill that had been passed by Congress, and the House refused to consider on Calendar Wednesday the amendment to the census bill that had been passed, as offered by Mr. Crumpacker, then chairman of this committee. The House refused to consider it on Calendar Wednesday, and for no other reason. On the following day, by a vote of 201 to 72, the House declared that any matter pertaining to the census bill was a matter of the highest privilege and entitled to consideration. In view of this holding, I have no disposition here to waste time unnecessarily. I know that there are certain Members who like to spin fine-spun arguments about points of order, but what do you get out of it? Just an unnecessary consumption of time; a useless waste of time. There is no one else here who is asking for recognition; there is no other committee having any bill to press for consideration; there is no logical, common-sense reason for not taking up and considering this bill at this time.

The Chair is of course familiar with the rulings of Speakers in the past, but at the same time I desire to direct the attention of the Chair to a former ruling upon this question. In Volume I, sections 305 to 308, Hinds' Precedents, are to be found decisions to the effect that matters arising under the provisions of the Constitution which are mandatory in their nature are privileged and supercede the rules establishing the order of business, as bills providing for the census or the apportionment.

The SPEAKER. From what is the gentleman quoting?

Mr. HELM. I am quoting from the Digest, at page 284. This is a ruling of the Chair, under Rule IX, upon the question of privilege. I do not think it is necessary to read anything except this one decision bearing upon this one question that is immediately up for consideration:

> So also certain matters of business, arising under provisions of the Constitution mandatory in nature, have been held to have a privilege which supersedes the rules establishing the order of business, as bills providing for census or apportionment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Would the gentleman contend that if the House should consider this bill and defeat it the Government would then be powerless to take the decennial census?

Mr. HELM. I do not suppose that the Government would be powerless to take it.

Mr. WALSH. They could take it without this bill being enacted.

Mr. HELM. But if you are going to take it, certainly the Congress is interested in having a census taken that is worth while, that is businesslike, the very best obtainable. The Congress does not want a census taken that is deficient and that does not cover the situation properly and virtually worthless.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the Congress has the right to provide what kind of a census is going to be taken.

Mr. HELM. And I believe, if you pass this bill, as I know you will, that you will have a satisfactory census.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It seems to me that the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts would be on all fours with considering a proposition whether, if there was no Congress elected, the Government would go on.

Mr. WALSH. No. My inquiry was prompted by reason of the fact that there is machinery already provided for taking this census, so that if this act should fail the Government could carry out the constitutional mandate and take this decennial census.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That, of course, would be a question of opinion.

Mr. WALSH. Anyone who reads the act of 1909 can see that that provided the machinery for future censuses.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a suggestion to the Chair regarding this point of order. I think it makes no difference what legislation exists; it makes no difference what the bill is that is to be presented for consideration. We have no right to consider the merits of the proposition at all, because the only question to be considered now is as to whether or not this is a privileged bill that may be brought before the House. I have no doubt in my own mind that it is, and it seems to me that the reason rests upon very good grounds that have already been stated in the decisions presented. The Speaker will remember that the provision of the Constitution regarding the taking of the census every 10 years is mandatory; it says that the enumeration shall be made. If that be true, Congress has an imperative duty laid upon it to enact legislation for the purpose of carrying out this provision of the Constitution. A gentleman suggests, what may happen if we do not do our duty. Of course such a dilemma might arise if we failed to perform any duty imposed upon us by the Constitution.

Mr. GILLETT. Suppose we had just passed a bill a month ago providing for the taking of the census, would we not have fulfilled the constitutional mandate?

Mr. TOWNER. No. I think the gentleman can not say that we have fulfilled the constitutional mandate, because whenever the Committee on the Census comes here with a bill to amend any existing law, whether it was passed a month ago or years ago, it would be privileged, and they would have the right to present it for the consideration of the House. What the House would do with it is for the House to determine; but we have only the question now to consider whether or not it is privileged.

Mr. GILLETT. But if we had passed a bill a month ago, we would have complied with the order of the Constitution which the gentleman says makes this privileged, and if we had complied with it, how can you argue it is privileged because it is necessary to comply with it?

Mr. TOWNER. I think the gentleman must see that the position would be untenable, because if we could pass a law of that kind to bind future Congresses regarding all census legislation, and then say that no future bill should be privileged for the consideration of the House under the provisions of the Constitution, we certainly could put the House in such condition that it could not carry out the mandates of the Constitution.

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, no; if the House had had an amendment it could amend that bill by a rule, but not because the Constitution ordered it, because the constitutional mandate has been complied with.

Mr. TOWNER. No; but the gentleman is considering the merits of the legislation——

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, no.

Mr. TOWNER. And that is not the question to be decided here. The only question to be decided here is whether or not it is privileged. Now, decisions have been uniform that this question being a constitutional mandate on the House is above all the rules of the House, and gives it a constitutionally privileged status. It is not for us to determine, the Speaker can not determine in advance what is the nature of this legislation. He only determines in advance that this legislation affects the census and that fact gives it a privileged status under the Constitution.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. HELM. It is true in 1910, when an amendment was offered to the bill which passed the House, and I think passed the Senate, an amendment to the eighth section of the 1910 census act was submitted by Mr. Crumpacker to amend the section so as to include mother tongues in the specifications under the schedule; the House then held by a vote of 201 to a vote of 72 that it was a privileged proposition. Therefore would it not naturally follow, if the House considered an amendment to a bill providing for the census privileged, that it certainly established a precedent for considering the bill itself as having a privileged status?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly; and that was my answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Iowa permit me to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Kentucky has in prior Congresses—and I would like to have the attention of the gentleman—reported bills providing for the taking of censuses, such as tobacco and the like. The gentleman has never contended that those bills having been reported in the ordinary way through the basket were privileged bills and should be considered at any time upon the gentleman's demand for recognition.

Mr. HELM. If I catch the gentleman's statement, was it a bill relating to a census for enumeration?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman recalls last Congress he reported a bill, a separate bill, providing for the taking of the census of tobacco statistics.

Mr. HELM. That is absolutely irrelevant.

Mr. STAFFORD. It may, in the judgment of the Speaker, be considered irrelevant, but it was a bill providing for the taking of a census of tobacco statistics, and yet the gentleman did not claim that it was a privileged bill. He did not seek to get recognition for the consideration of it as a privileged matter.

Mr. HELM. I was not undertaking such a preposterous proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin will not contend that the bill he is talking about, the tobacco bill, stands on the same footing as a census bill proper, will he?

Mr. STAFFORD. I contend in line with the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts that there is to-day on the statute books a law passed by the Congress providing for the next decennial census to meet the requirements of the constitutional mandate. Such law having been passed and on the statute books that meets the requirements of the Constitution.

Any amendment to that law as suggested in the case I instanced would have such privileged status as this bill here which seeks to supersede the bill now on the statute books providing for a decennial census. The situation before the Speaker is different to-day in determining whether it is privileged than the question was when submitted to prior Speakers, because that was a bill where there was no law on the statute books providing for the taking of a decennial census in the future. But here—and I am proceeding entirely through the courtesy of the gentleman from Iowa—as pointed out by the gentleman from Massachusetts, we have in the act of 1909 a law providing for the taking of the thirteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, and if the Speaker will examine the law he will see that the requirement of the Constitution has been met. Now, this is a new question that is presented for the Speaker's decision. If there were no law on the statute books providing for the taking of a census, well might the gentleman from Kentucky argue that a bill providing for the taking of the coming census is privileged, but there being existing law on the statute books for the same object of taking the next decennial census, this bill, instead of being merely an amendment to one section of the bill, as for instance, if it referred only to agricultural statistics, amends the entire law, therefore I respectfully contend it is a parallel case to that which was instanced by me in my query propounded to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield to allow me to ask a question of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. TOWNER. I will let the gentleman have the whole time in just a moment. I only want to say a couple of sentences. Mr. Speaker, if any question arose regarding the taking of the enumeration of the census, then, of course, the question, in my judgment, would be constitutional. The gentleman's instance regarding the taking of the census of tobacco would not be an enumeration at all. Of course, we have attached these other propositions to the enumeration proper and made them part of the census. But such a bill standing alone would not be privileged, because it would not be an enumeration and would not be constitutional. I want now, in closing, to call particular attention to what is the gist of these decisions. They hold that certain matters of business are privileged if they arise under mandatory provisions of the Constitution. If a bill is reported from a committee which provides for the performance of a mandate of the Constitution it is a privileged bill, no matter whether our rules make it so or not. This is that kind of a bill; it provides for the taking of the census in accordance with the mandatory provision of the Constitution, requiring that every 10 years an enumeration shall be made for the purpose of basing representation. That is this legislation, and the consideration of such legislation must be, strictly speaking, a constitutional right. The committee has a right at any time to ask the House to consider such a bill. The Constitution gives it a privileged status.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. GILLETT. May I make just one suggestion?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. It is this: The argument in favor of privilege has been changed a little, and they now argue if this did not affect the enumeration it would not be in order, but inasmuch as it does affect enumeration it is in order.

Now, there is a principle which the Speaker knows is well established, that if a question is privileged and it is coupled with matter that is not privileged, it loses its privilege. Now, according to the very argument that is made by my opponents, this bill affects not only enumeration but various other things relating to agriculture and manufacturing, and so forth.

So by their very argument they admit certain matter in this bill is not privileged, and therefore it seems to me by that addition the whole bill is robbed of its privilege. Certainly they can not add to a bill providing for the enumeration which the Constitution orders all the other matter they please and still claim that it is privileged because the Constitution orders it. That could only be done by a rule of the House.

The SPEAKER. The whole intention of the mandate of the Constitution in regard to the taking of the census was in order to find out how many people there were in the United States; and that was the whole thing. And the reason for wanting to know the number of people in the United States every 10 years is for the sole purpose of making a reapportionment of the Members of the House. Now, to call that tobacco bill about which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] was talking, a census, is an abuse of the American language. It is not a census.

Mr. GILLETT. If the Chair will permit, this bill provides for a census also of agriculture, manufactures, and mines and quarries of the United States.

The SPEAKER. If that was all there was in this bill it would be an abuse of the American language to call it a census bill. Everybody knows a census has reference to numbers. The mandate of the Constitution is imperative, and it has been decided by four or five Speakers, incidentally or directly, that a census bill is privileged. And the Chair holds, and states his opinion, obiter dictum, that all that was intended to put in the census bill originally was the number of people, but it was spread out until it embraced the commercial history of the United States every 10 years. But that has nothing to do with it. The sole reason for that mandate is to find out the number of people in this country every 10 years.

The point of order is overruled. The motion of the gentleman is to go into the Committee of the Whole.

WITHDRAWAL OF CONFERENCE REPORT—PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like, if the gentleman would yield before that motion is put—I would like to ask unanimous consent in reference to a conference report. The conference report on the bill S. 1553, for the protection of migratory birds, was filed under the rules for printing. Since we agreed on this report the conferees on the part of the Senate have made a request that the conferees on the part of the House withdraw this report and take it back to conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to withdraw the conference report referred to. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WILSON of Texas, by unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. MANSFIELD, was granted leave of absence for five days, on account of sickness.

FOURTEENTH AND SUBSEQUENT DECENNIAL CENSUSES.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WALSH. To propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will propound it.

Mr. WALSH. In view of the ruling of the Chair as to the bill providing for the taking of the census, I desire to ask if the question of consideration was raised against this bill?

The SPEAKER. It is raised by the vote to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but I mean after the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. That would be for the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to decide.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think so.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the Chair will permit, the very motion to go into the Committee of the Whole raises the question.

The SPEAKER. That is exactly what the Chair stated to the House a minute ago.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the Chair should have added that it does not then pertain to the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to entertain any motion for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has nothing to do with the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERLEY. The rules of the House determine that he has no power to consider it.

The SPEAKER. I know; but the Chair is not called upon to construe the duties of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. The question is on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on this bill, H. R. 11984.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I think we had better have a quorum on such an important bill, and I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of no quorum, and evidently there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of going into the Committee of the Whole will, as their names are called, answer "yea" and those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 151, nays 118, answered "present" 2, not voting 159, as follows:

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I wonder if Mr. STEELE voted?

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. BUTLER. I think probably I had better withdraw my vote. I voted "nay." I have a general pair with Mr. STEELE.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. BUTLER, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present, and the Sergeant at Arms will open the doors. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HELM. Before the House goes into Committee of the Whole, Mr. Speaker, I would like to see if an arrangement can not be made as to the disposition of the time.

The SPEAKER. Too late.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11984, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I am not disposed to consume any of the time of the committee in presenting this bill. The necessity for its passage arises by reason of the constitutional mandate. It is a bill that has to be passed.

I have heretofore stated some of the reasons why the bill should be passed at this session of the Congress. Any delay in the passage of it would simply create confusion. Those who are familiar with the legislation of this kind in 1910 will perhaps remember that that bill was vetoed by President Roosevelt and that the bill that finally became a law was signed by President Taft, July 2, 1909, after the decennial period had begun.

Now, the bill providing for the Thirteenth decennial census is virtually a reenactment of the bill providing for the Twelfth Decennial Census, both of which provided for a census of population, agriculture, manufactures, mines, and quarries. I have been unable to find a census bill that has been passed by the Congress of the United States where an enumeration of the population and a census of agriculture, manufactures, mines, and quarries has not been included.

Now, what is the common sense of this proposition? The first thing, a supervisor is appointed and an enumerator is appointed for each township, precinct, or voting district. If anyone would stop and reflect, he would realize that the Director of the Census or the Secretary of Commerce, or whoever is to appoint the supervisor, must have sufficient and ample time before the 1st day of January, 1920, to marshal his forces with which to take the census. Now, I am more familiar with the procedure in the country than I am in the cities; in fact, I have no familiarity with the procedure in the cities in the taking of the census. But a supervisor is appointed, say, for each congressional district in the United States—each county district, we will say. The enumerators are appointed. The enumerator goes to the head of the family and ascertains the number in the family, the age, the nationality, the color, the race, the mother tongue, and at the same time he can ask, in the rural districts, how many acres of land he owns, how many head of cattle he has on his land, how many head of horses he has, how many head of mules he has, how many hogs, how many sheep, how much corn he produced, how much wheat he produced—the same man.

Now, where is there any good business reason, if you are going to send men throughout the United States to take an enumeration of the population, why he should not gather this other information? You pay him no more for taking an agricultural census. The same man does all the work for the same cost. According to the old saying, you kill two birds with one stone.

Now, there are those who are disposed to contend that you simply need an enumeration of the population. You may say, "What benefit is it to know that you have so many million hogs in the United States, so many million sheep, so many million cattle?" The knowledge that there are 100,000,000 men, women, and children in the United States does not add or subtract a human being from the sum total, but it is of high importance and consequence that you should know how many human beings there are in the United States, especially those liable for military service. A separate census of the population would cost you three-fifths of the sum that it would cost to take the census in the usual way; that is to say, a census of the population, of agriculture, of manufactures, and of mines and quarries.

Now there are some matters that I would like to discuss, but I think the best time to discuss them is under the five-minute rule. I hope that we can get to the consideration of the bill as soon as possible. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will it embarrass the gentleman to ask him a question?

Mr. HELM. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume the Director of the Census recommended an increase in the number of supervisors as provided in the bill under consideration from 330 to 400. What was the argument that he advanced for providing more supervisors than were provided in the last census?

Mr. HELM. As the gentleman is well aware, in 1910 the membership of this House was, I believe, 394.

Mr. STAFFORD. Three hundred and ninety-six.

Mr. HELM. Three hundred and ninety-six. Since then the membership of this House has increased and is now 435.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I recall, in the census of 1910 at Chicago there was but one supervisor of the census. In my city there was but one. It has two congressional districts. Chicago has four or five.

Mr. BRITTEN. Ten.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Illinois says 10. Now, it has been the policy heretofore to have one supervisor of the census for each large city, and I was wondering what was the policy that was going to be followed by the present director in dividing up the rest of the districts so as to provide a greater number than one for each congressional district——

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to yield, with the permission of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM].

Mr. ASWELL. The reason for that is very evident. In a city the territory is relatively small, and it is a simple matter for the supervisor to oversee the work. It is a question of area.

Mr. STAFFORD. Heretofore it has always been the practice to appoint one supervisor for each congressional district, unless that congressional district was within the confines of a city.

Mr. ASWELL. In the case of a city, the population being closer together, less supervision is required.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then there would be less supervision required than under the last census, and the supervisors for the last census were only 330. The population has increased in the cities rather than in the country. I am trying to ascertain the reasons why there has been this recommendation for this increased number, greater than the increased number of congressional districts, and, further, because the congressional districts have not increased outside of the large cities.

Mr. ASWELL. The gentleman is mistaken. The number of supervisors is less than the number of congressional districts by 35.

Mr. STAFFORD. As compared to what it was 10 years ago. The number of supervisors 10 years ago was 330 and the representation 396. Now, the supervisors provided by this bill are 400, and the number of congressional districts is 435. There has been a greater increase in the number of supervisors than in the representation, and this added representation has come from the cities, where there will be but one supervisor to a city.

Mr. ASWELL. There will be two supervisors in those cities where the number has increased as the gentleman states.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was the very point I was trying to get information about, as to what will be the policy of the present director of the Census.

Mr. HELM. There has been no policy announced by the director relative to the appointment of supervisors for the cities that I am aware of. I have no right to speak for the director as to what will be his policy, but I think I see a business reason in all this matter. The city of New York has only one mayor, while its population is larger, of course, than that of the State of Kentucky. Each State has only one governor. I can not see any reason for having one supervisor for each county. If you did have one for each county, you would need as many supervisors as you have county judges. But inasmuch as you have only one mayor, and he performs the duties of an office far more responsible and having far greater ramifications than that of a supervisor, if one man can hold down the mayor's job, it seems to me one man ought to be able to hold down the job of a supervisor for a city. However, I have no authority to speak for the director in that matter. It may be that he will appoint a supervisor for each congressional district in a city like Boston or a city like New York or a city like Chicago. I am fully convinced, however, that the director is a man of good, sound business sense, and I believe he will undertake to do what is for the best interests of the Government in order to obtain an efficient census.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ELSTON. Do I understand the gentleman to suggest that it would be as cheap to take a census of all these subjects as it would be to take a census of population, inasmuch as the same agent will take down all the data?

Mr. HELM. No; I was unfortunate if I was so understood. I said that the cost of taking a census of population, of manufactures, of agriculture, of mines, and of quarries would cost a certain amount, and that the taking of a census of the population would cost three-fifths as much as it would to take a census of all five subjects.

Mr. ELSTON. I notice in the report of the committee that you mention a total of $17,987,000, and that you have various parts of this total apportioned to the different subjects of population, agriculture, manufactures, and so forth.

Mr. HELM. Those who appeared before the committee represented that it would cost $10,000,000 to make an enumeration of the population.

Mr. ELSTON. You have apportioned, in round figures, $7,000,000 to population, $6,000,000 to agriculture, $2,000,000 to manufactures, $300,000 to mines and quarries, and to overhead expenses $2,500,000.

Mr. HELM. That is where they are all taken at the same time, and the $17,000,000 is apportioned among the different divisions.

Mr. ELSTON. What would be the saving if you should take a census of population alone, with incidental questions that bear on population?

Mr. HELM. You would spend three-fifths of $17,000,000, and to take them all at the same time is a good business proposition.

Mr. ELSTON. In other words, it would cost about $10,000,000 to take a census of the population.

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. And $7,000,000 additional to take the items in regard to manufactures, agriculture, mines, and quarries.

Mr. HELM. If the gentleman will look a little further he will see that to take a census of the population separately it will cost $10,000,000, in round numbers. If you take a census of agriculture separately it will cost you another $10,000,000.

Mr. ELSTON. That is assuming——

Mr. HELM. Just a moment. The gentleman has served in the House with great distinction and has had an opportunity to observe that whenever any matter of this kind is not taken up by the bureau that ought to handle it, that was established for the purpose of doing the work, some other enterprising committee, Member of the House, or departmental official will rush in here with a bill costing far more than the cost of doing the work by the proper officials and through the proper channels.

Mr. ELSTON. That leads to the question that I want to ask. Is it imperatively necessary that a decennial census shall be taken on all of these other subject matters in addition to population? Is the expenditure of an additional $7,000,000 on subsidiary matters warranted?

Mr. HELM. I suppose the gentleman was here when the argument was made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, who stated that the census of 1910, 1900, and, if I am not mistaken, in 1890, provided for the taking of the census of agriculture and manufactures.

Mr. ELSTON. I understand that, but there has been a development in the way of organization of a Labor Department, more complex organization of the Agricultural Department, and evolution in regard to the whole Government in that time. These and other departments and bureaus send out agents and otherwise gather information set forth in various bulletins. My question relates to the policy of keeping these collateral subject matters on the list because you had them 20 years ago.

Mr. HELM. Let the committee get this clear in its mind. The work on this bill begins July 1, 1919. I want to repeat that in order that you may get it. There is nothing to be done under this bill until July 1, 1919. There is not a single instrumentality of the Government that has been authorized by Congress to do any of the work covered by this bill. All of the legislation introduced by the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, all of the measures looking to the food surveys and the stock-taking matter expires July 1, 1919, and the work provided for in this census begins July 1, 1919, and not until then. So there is not a particle of overlapping or duplication of activities so far as these features of legislation are concerned.

Mr. ELSTON. May I ask the gentleman this question: Is there going to be a change in the issuance of this information? It is taken by the Government, we will say, in the decennial year. We are getting the results even now, eight and nine years old—matter absolutely dead—obtained at an immense expense. We know the periodical volumes that are sent out from the Census Bureau long after the information was gathered. They have no value in the way of current news. It seems to me that an inquiry into the policy of this thing would be timely.

Mr. HELM. I am very glad the gentleman has brought that feature of the proposition to the attention of the committee. I want to explain it because there seems to be the very widest misconception and misinformation about the matter, especially in that particular. When this data is returned by the enumerator to the supervisor, and sent by him—the supervisor—to the director, who compiles it and gets it into concrete form, he—the director—summarizes it and bulletins are published forthwith by the director available for distribution, and if the people of the United States knew the amount and volume and character of the information that is in this Census Bureau available for the people of the United States the Census Bureau instead of being a kind of legislative football to be kicked around and criticized would be one of the most popular bureaus of the Government, because there is information in it that is as valuable if not more so than in any other bureau in the United States Government.

You would think that if there was a man connected with the Government of the United States who ought to know what he is talking about at this time when we are at war it would be the Secretary of Agriculture. You need a doctor when you are sick; and when your country is at war and you are undertaking to supply 3,000,000 soldiers in the United States with shoes and with food and clothing and then help feed the rest of the world, you would want all the information you could possibly obtain. Now, the testimony before this committee is—and I have no doubt it will astonish you—was furnished partly by the Secretary of Agriculture. He says that the Census Bureau is the best census bureau in the world. That statement was corroborated by a representative of the Food Survey, Mr. Hoover's branch of the Government, who says that this bureau furnishes it the only actual, dependable, valuable information in the country.

Mr. ELSTON. Is not that the current work of the bureau? They do not go back to data that they got 10 years ago for the present information of the different departments. That is a different thing from the 10-year census. It has no relationship to this matter.

Mr. HELM. I think the trouble is that I have not understood the gentleman's position.

Mr. ELSTON. I will give an illustration. Two weeks ago I received a little pamphlet giving statistics on the manufactures of cities on the Pacific coast collected 10 years ago. That is of little interest to me at the present time. We have agencies of the Government that collect facts when they are needed, but that is a different function from that involved in a decennial census, the results of which are not published for a long period.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman say that the Government is issuing for the first time facts taken by the Census Bureau 10 years ago?

Mr. ELSTON. Additional manufacturing statistics based on the collection of data taken 10 years ago.

Mr. ALEXANDER. They would have to have a basis to make the statistical compilation. If the gentleman will take the pains to read the hearings before the committee, I think he will be convinced of the importance of taking a census not only of the inhabitants but of agriculture, manufactures, mines, and quarries.

All those who came before the committee emphasized that it is more important now than ever before, and the great commercial bodies of the country, the manufacturers, and the industrial people of the country all regard it as of prime importance. We were very careful to investigate, because we were inquiring like the gentleman to know if there is urgent necessity for it.

Mr. ELSTON. I am not discussing this matter in a captious way. I am obliged to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] for his patience. I realize the committee has held hearings and is well informed. My inquiries are based on surface impressions that I have received from time to time, and this is my expression of them.

Mr. HELM. I think I understand the difficulty with which the gentleman is confronted.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, may I make one statement to the gentleman? I call his attention to the fact that the Census Bureau issues all these statistics immediately, as the gentleman knows, in a large volume, and then from time to time thereafter during the entire 10 years they take certain statistics and reprint them, so to speak, make them talk—draw conclusions, philosophize, and so forth, on those already issued before. That probably is the case to which the gentleman refers with reference to the last few days.

Mr. ELSTON. I have no doubt that I shall get more information as we proceed with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Along the line of the questions propounded by the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON] to what extent is the work of the Census Bureau continued during the 10 years? In other words, can they now, when they begin the new census, proceed with data accumulated during the period of 10 years past, or is every census taken at the conclusion of the 10-year period an entirely new census, independent of the work done in the meantime?

Mr. HELM. I do not think that I quite grasp what the gentleman has in mind, but I shall endeavor to answer his question as best I can. There are quite a number of activities performed by the Census Bureau. For instance, take the question of transportation, of electricity, and of vital statistics. In different years, under the act creating the permanent Census Bureau, which I believe was passed March 6, 1902, there are a number of subjects to be dealt with by the Census Bureau. Some of these subjects are taken up one year and other subjects another year. In other words, it is the policy of the bureau to keep busy all of the time, but not working all of the time upon the same subject.

Mr. LONDON. So that there is really no national statistical bureau to which a man seeking information may turn for knowledge on a particular subject. Assume you want to know what was the number of men out of employment in the year 1914, in September. There is no place to which you could turn for that information.

Mr. HELM. No place that I know of.

Mr. LONDON. If you want to know the number of factories which employed more than 500 people in 1914, there is no place where you could get that information.

Mr. HELM. I am not so sure about that.

Mr. LONDON. There is no national bureau outside of the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Mr. HELM. The Bureau of the Census takes a census of manufactures, but not to ascertain how many men are employed in every factory in the United States every day of the year.

Mr. LONDON. Or every year.

Mr. HELM. The bureau takes the census of manufactures every five years, but there is no instrumentality of the Government to which anyone can go and find out how many factories of a particular kind were running every day in the week and every week in the year.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he can state from memory the number of positions that this bill provides for outside of those strictly within the classified service?

Mr. HELM. I believe that the regular census force which is carried in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill numbers about 560, which might be called the office force, and that there are about 700 of what might be termed field men, composed principally of cotton-gin reporters. That is in ordinary times.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The permanent force.

Mr. HELM. What might be called the permanent census force; but in a period of this kind, as the gentleman can well understand, it will be necessary to have enumerators in every township in every congressional district. How many enumerators there will be I do not know. I do not know how many townships or voting precincts or districts there are in the United States, nor how many enumeration districts will be established by the director. All of that work has to be done in advance of the taking of the census. The gentleman can make his own calculations in a general way. The Director of the Census or someone connected with the Bureau of the Census stated that the number of enumerators, supervisors, or the added force, you might call it, will be somewhere around 75,000 people.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. I would like to state that in the last census, 10 years ago, the number of enumerators was 71,000, and they estimate this time it will take 75,000 or 80,000.

Mr. DENISON. How are they to be appointed?

Mr. HELM. By the Secretary of Commerce, upon the recommendation of the Director of the Census.

Mr. GILLETT. Those are appointed by the supervisor, are they not?

Mr. HELM. Oh, no.

Mr. GILLETT. I thought he appointed the enumerators.

Mr. HELM. He recommends them to the director and the director recommends them to the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. DENISON. Are we to understand all of these 75,000 men are political appointments; that is, appointments outside of the classified service?

Mr. ASWELL. They could not be classified; they only work for three weeks.

Mr. HELM. The enumerators will not be covered by the civil-service rules and regulations. But all of the clerical force, with some exceptions, that will be added to what might be termed the permanent census force are to undergo a civil-service examination.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HELM. Certainly.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman tell us why the supervisors are provided by this bill to be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce instead of by the President as heretofore?

Mr. HELM. Well, there is one very obvious reason. This work is to begin on July 1, 1919. Now, if you will just reflect for a moment, there will be no session of Congress at that time, and if you wait until Congress convenes in December, 1919, when the actual field work is already in progress and going, why the director has to have his supervisors appointed before the work begins, and if you are going to have the Senate confirm the appointment of the supervisors, why you are going to get into the same unfortunate situation that the gentleman from Massachusetts has well in mind that started by reason of the failure to provide legislation at the proper time and give the last director the opportunity of organizing and getting his force marshaled and his bureau in working condition. It followed all the way through the work, and it was a most disastrous affair.

Mr. GILLETT. Why, the Senate will be in session in 1919.

Mr. HELM. Congress will convene the first Monday in December, 1919.

Mr. GILLETT. But the Senate always convenes immediately after March 4. There is always an extra session of the Senate after the 4th day of March, and there will be after the 4th of March, 1919.

Mr. HELM. The decennial period does not begin until July 1, 1919, and I hardly think—I do not think the gentleman from Massachusetts believes that the Senate will remain in session from March 4, 1919, until July 1, 1919.

Mr. GILLETT. No; but why should not they be appointed in March; it is only three months ahead?

Mr. HELM. Well, you might ask why not appoint them now.

Mr. GILLETT. There is a difference between appointing them two months ahead and a year ahead.

Mr. HELM. If we passed the bill before this session adjourns, why, with the House and Senate both here, why not let the Senate confirm them?

Mr. GILLETT. There is a difference between two months and a year, is there not?

Mr. HELM. You see what an impossible situation it would be. You do not want to require that the supervisors shall be appointed by the President and that their appointment shall be confirmed by the Senate when there is no Senate sitting.

Mr. GILLETT. It will be sitting in March.

Mr. HELM. It is sitting now. It will be just as good business to appoint them and let the Senate confirm them now as it would be to follow out the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GILLETT. What month does the gentleman think they ought to be appointed in to begin the work in July?

Mr. HELM. What month?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. HELM. If the work begins July 1, I would say we ought to have the work going as soon after the 1st of July as possible, and begin certainly not later than July 1, 1919.

Mr. GILLETT. Of course, it would not do any harm if they were appointed two or three months before that and knew they were going to do the work.

Mr. HELM. I do not say it would do any harm, but it will not do any good.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he has a special reason why they should be confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; and I propose to debate that.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will say to the gentleman there was a committee on legislation for the Fourteenth decennial census appointed, composed of W. L. Austin (chairman), W. C. Hunt, Joseph A. Hill, C. S. Sloane, T. J. Fitzgerald, W. M. Steuart, and E. F. Hartley——

Mr. GILLETT. What page is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. ALEXANDER. From page 36. They are chiefs of division in the Census Bureau on whom the task was devolved of the determination and study of the law under which the thirteenth decennial census was taken and to suggest amendments to the law, and this is what they say referring to the manner in which the supervisors shall be selected:

> The section as amended provides that "the supervisors shall be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce upon the recommendation of the Director of the Census." This change has been introduced mainly for the reason that the Senate in all probability will not be in session at the time when the appointment of supervisors must be made. The next census, if the law is amended in accordance with the recommendations of this committee, will be taken in January, 1920.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not find that on page 36.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am reading from page 21 in reference to amendments to section 9.

> The present Congress will expire March 4, 1919, and the next Congress will normally not meet until December of that year. But the supervisors should be selected and commissioned between July 1, the date on which the bureau is organized on the decennial census basis, and October 1, or 90 days before the date of the census.

I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that if he will refer to the hearings, beginning on page 9 to page 36, he will find a review of the old census law and the changes recommended by the committee whose names I have given.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. HELM. With pleasure.

Mr. WALSH. If I understood the gentleman correctly, in distinguishing between taking the census of cattle, hogs, mules, live stock, and so forth, and the census of the people, the gentleman stated that it would not do any good to get the number of sheep, hogs, and mules of the country, because enumerating them would not add to the number in the country.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman did not get me right. That is the view of those who are opposed to taking the census of agriculture and who say in support of their contention that it adds nothing to the quantity of live stock to take a census of it; neither does it add anything to the number of people by taking an enumeration of the population. That was illustrative of the proposition.

Mr. WALSH. But that is not the purpose of the taking of the census of the population. The purpose of taking the census of the population is that an apportionment may be made; but you do not make any apportionment of live stock.

Mr. HELM. Of course, the gentleman understands that the Constitution, when he refers to the Constitution, states that that is the purpose of making the enumeration; but there are vast and innumerable uses to be made of the enumeration of the population. For instance, I do not suppose that the gentleman would be satisfied to live without knowing the population of Boston or some of the other portions of his State.

Mr. WALSH. We take a State census every five years in my State and pay for it out of the treasury of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HELM. And we are just as anxious to know the number of people that inhabit the little city in which we live, and we are all very much concerned. In fact, the difficulty has been to restrain and to prevent enterprising and ambitious——

Mr. WALSH. The desire for that knowledge down in the gentleman's section is very commendable, but some of the States take a census on their own account.

Mr. HELM. From their desire to know——

Mr. WALSH. No. In order to know that the elected officials represent a proper proportion in making up the various municipal and State districts. But in taking a census at this particular time of the number of cattle and other live stock in the country, while it might be valuable, I think it might well be deferred until conditions are more settled and that we might rely upon the investigations that have already been made by various other activities of the Government.

Mr. HELM. Well, if I may venture to express an opinion——

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman certainly may.

Mr. HELM. I would think the Quartermaster General of the Army, if he had a demand for so many million pounds of beef or so many million pounds of pork for the use of the Army, if the Army is up to 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 men, would certainly think it is of the very highest consequence.

Mr. WALSH. Certainly it is; and he would not wait until July, 1919, to find out about it.

Mr. HELM. The point in that is, that we do not know how long this war is going to last. I wish it was over now. I am somewhat inclined to fear that it may last through 1920, and longer. And if it does and our country is exhausted, as France now is in her resources and we want information in order to know whether we can support an Army of a given size or not and how much of supplies we can let England have and how much we can let France have, I take it that in 1920—this census is to begin on January 1—in 60 days we would know. I know that we are a "right-now" people. We want a thing right now. We want our work done just like we order our breakfast and our lunches and our dinners.

Mr. WALSH. We can find about all that now. We do not even have to wait 60 days. We just call up by telephone or go down and see Mr. Hoover, and he can tell us how much flour and how much wheat we are going to have, and how much meat there is, and how many meatless days; and if the Quartermaster General wants that information he ought to be able to secure it. How have they been able to get along so far without the census? The Quartermaster General has had to buy supplies for the Army.

Mr. HELM. You are better informed than they claim to be themselves.

Mr. WALSH. I am taking what the Official Bulletin says and what Mr. Hoover says in his official interviews with the press, and I know the gentleman has read them, because he follows closely all kinds of official information.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts think we ought not to take a census of the agricultural resources of the country at all?

Mr. WALSH. I certainly do.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Assuming the war is to continue, could you imagine any time more important to do it than in time of war, when we are trying to conserve and utilize all our resources?

Mr. WALSH. Taking the census for the purpose of utilizing our resources for war purposes is one thing, and that is being done by the Department of Agriculture every year, but taking the decennial census, upon which to form estimates and base conclusions in the midst of a great war, is another proposition altogether.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The Secretary differs very much from the gentleman from Massachusetts.

If the gentleman will take and read the statement that the Secretary made before the committee, and is persuaded thereby as to the policy, he will agree with him that it is of the utmost importance to include a census of agriculture in the census of 1920.

Mr. WALSH. The Secretary of Agriculture made some very persuasive arguments before the committee, I will admit; but the Secretary of Agriculture is taking censuses or making investigation every year, and he has become an expert at that, and, of course, he can make a very persuasive argument to have somebody else do it.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the gentleman from Massachusetts is mistaken. The Department of Agriculture does not ever take a census. It bases its estimates upon the census taken by the Census Bureau.

Mr. WALSH. They do not call it a census. They call it a survey, but it amounts to practically the same thing.

Mr. HELM. They make a crop estimate.

Mr. WALSH. The figures are furnished by the men who raise the crops, just as when they take a census.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman never was worse mistaken in his life. As a general thing the gentleman from Massachusetts is reasonably accurate——

Mr. WALSH. I thank the gentleman——

Mr. HELM. But the suggestions that are made to him and the misinformation that men are passing to him lead him far afield. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. Oh, well; the gentleman does not mean to deny that we make appropriations here every year for numerous field agents of the Department of Agriculture whose duty it is to travel throughout the country and make investigations and get statistics and information from the people who are growing the crops.

Mr. HELM. Let me set the gentleman right. The Department of Agriculture does have men in the field who report to the department as to the condition of the crops, the acreage, and so forth; but the men that I have in mind—and I am a countryman——

Mr. WALSH. One would never dream it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HELM. It shows on my face?

Mr. KEARNS. Or on the clothes. [Laughter.]

Mr. HELM. These men that the department has in the field simply ride through the country along the road; they look at a wheat field and they say, "There is 40 or 50 acres of wheat." They guess it will yield 10 or 15 or 20 bushels per acre. That is the kind of information that the Department of Agriculture gets, and it is my information that they do not pay those men anything for that service, and I am glad of it. It is just so many hundred thousand guesses, if they have a hundred thousand of them. That is the best you can make out of it. Every one of them is guessing, both as to quantity and area, and so on; and I submit it to these men who are present here who live in the rural districts if I am not correct.

Mr. WALSH. The only man from a rural district that I see is the gentleman from Milwaukee. [Laughter.]

Mr. HELM. These men who furnish the crop estimates are not paid a cent. I am not referring to those men who are sent out under Mr. Hoover. I refer to the men who make the crop estimates. I do not refer to the men who represent the ginners and make the ginners' reports.

Mr. WALSH. Well, they waste a good deal of valuable printer's ink and paper on guesses, if that is correct.

Mr. HELM. I knew that if the gentleman were given the right information his opinion would be correct.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think the gentleman is correct in his contention.

Mr. HELM. I think it will stand investigation.

Mr. WALSH. I think it is worthy of investigation.

Mr. HELM. I hope the gentleman will investigate it. He needs information.

Mr. COX. The gentleman may be right in what he says about men traveling over the country estimating that a field will produce so many bushels to the acre. Out in my country every county has a reporter. He gets no pay at all. I know a gentleman in my county who is a fertilizer agent and sells farming implements, who keeps a close eye on the amount of ground sown in wheat and oats and rye each year.

Mr. ROBBINS. One man can do it for a whole county?

Mr. COX. One man in each county can do that.

Mr. HELM. You see how unreliable it is to get information like that.

Mr. COX. That information is reliable. That county agent deals with farmers every day. He knows, and he makes his monthly reports to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. WALSH. If he is on the pay roll, the same information becomes more valuable.

Mr. COX. He is not on the salary roll. He knows approximately how many bushels of wheat are grown in that county.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, and had come to no resolution thereon.

AMERICAN LEAGUE FOR THE PROTECTION OF PRISONERS IN GERMANY.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject of the American League for the Protection of Prisoners in Germany.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the subject of the American League for the Protection of Prisoners in Germany. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 41 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, June 22, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriation for eight additional clerks in the office of the Auditor for the Interior Department for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1184); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting tentative draft of a bill to amend article 57 of section 1342 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 1185); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting schedules of claims allowed by the several accounting officers of the Treasury Department under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund (H. Doc. No. 1186); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. KEY of Ohio, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (S. 4444) to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, or in China, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 675), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CROSSER: A bill (H. R. 12533) to prevent extortion and to impose taxes upon excess profits in rents and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MOON: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 307) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 12534) granting a pension to Huldah E. Hall; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee: A bill (H. R. 12535) granting an increase of pension to Gambo C. Villines; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FLOOD: A bill (H. R. 12536) granting a pension to Harriet E. Brown; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KELLEY of Michigan: A bill (H. R. 12537) granting an increase of pension to Lewis H. Van Antwerp; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LITTLE: A bill (H. R. 12538) to correct the military record of Samuel D. Jarman; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12539) granting a pension to Maude McDonald; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TALBOTT: A bill (H. R. 12540) granting a pension to Mary Waters Reeve; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. BROWNING: Petitions of members of the Methodist Protestant Church, of Westville; of citizens of Sewell, Mullica Hill, and Pitman; of citizens of West Collingswood, Haddon Heights, Thorofare, Wenonah, Audubon, Collingswood, Merchantville, Gloucester City, Haddonfield, and Atco, employees of a shipbuilding plant; of citizens of Swedsboro, Michkleton, Clarksboro, and Mount Royal; and of citizens of Salem, all in the State of New Jersey, urging nation-wide prohibition during the period of the war; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee: Papers accompanying bill granting an increased pension to Gambo C. Williams; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DILLON: Petition of sundry citizens of South Dakota, urging the passage of the Barkley prohibition bill; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ELSTON: Memorial of the L. H. Liscum Camp, United Spanish War Veterans, of Oakland, Cal., favoring S. 4444, granting pensions for widows of Spanish War veterans; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HAMILTON of New York: Petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the city of Jamestown, and of sundry citizens of Dunkirk, N. Y., favoring the early passage of national war prohibition legislation; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a resolution adopted at a public meeting held in Portville, N. Y., favoring the adoption of the amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the practice of polygamy and polygamous cohabitation; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KELLEY of Michigan: Petition of L. M. O'Dell and 88 other residents of Webberville, Mich., in favor of the Barkley war-time prohibition bill; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Lansing, Mich., in favor of prohibition during the period of the war; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania: Petition of the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce, for immediate improvement of highways; to the Committee on Roads.

By Mr. SNELL: Petition of the men's Bible class, Presbyterian Church, Saranac Lake, N. Y., favoring the prohibition of the beverage-liquor traffic during the period of the war as a war measure; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Saranac Lake, N. Y., favoring the prohibition of the beverage-liquor traffic during the period of the war as a war measure; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 22, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. William Couden, of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Infinite and Holy One, at this mid-day hour we ask Thy forgiveness, the sense of Thy abiding presence, and Thy guidance and help. And we beseech Thee, O God of battles, of justice, and of peace, to be with us as a people; that we may accomplish Thy will in this era of strife, and that we may keep ever before us the cross and spirit of our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the census bill.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman had permission to extend his remarks yesterday.

Mr. ASWELL. And I extended my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the census bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RESTRICTING COAL SUPPLIES TO BREWERIES.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged motion. I move to discharge the Committee on Agriculture from the further consideration of House resolution 394.

The SPEAKER. How does it become privileged?

Mr. CRAMTON. It is a resolution of inquiry which has been before the committee for the proper length of time.

Mr. FOSTER. Let us hear the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 394.

Resolved, That the President be requested to report to the House of Representatives, if not incompatible with the public interest, whether any order has been issued by the United States Fuel Administration restricting the supply of coal to persons, partnerships, associations, or corporations engaged in the manufacture of brewed, malt, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors, and if so, to what extent.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman unanimous consent to consider the resolution?

The SPEAKER. He does not have to have unanimous consent; it is made privileged from the fact that the committee did not report it back at the end of seven days.

Mr. GARNER. What committee was it referred to?

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I think this is a resolution that no one has any objection to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, as to whether this is a privileged resolution or not it is merely based on conjecture.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin wish to make a point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules it. The question is on the resolution.

Mr. CRAMTON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAMTON. The question is on the discharge of the committee, is it not?

The SPEAKER. On discharging the committee and agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CRAMTON) there were 20 ayes and 17 noes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be again reported.

Without objection, the Clerk again reported the resolution.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 205, nays 47, answered "present" 2, not voting 176, as follows:

RENT PROFITEERING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Relative to a newspaper article which appeared the other day concerning myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, on the 20th instant there appeared in the Washington Times an article which evidently emanated from the Senate conferees on the antiprofiteering rent bill, which article is as follows:

[Washington Times, June 20, 1918.]

BEN JOHNSON MAY BE BARRED FROM FLOOR OF SENATE.

Because Chairman JOHNSON, of the House District Committee, in a recent speech in the House charged that the Pomerene antiprofiteering bill was written in the interests of the real estate people of the District the Senate District Committee this afternoon is considering whether the committee will refuse to hold a conference on the bill if Mr. JOHNSON remains a member of the conference. Another course which some of the members of the committee have suggested is to bring the matter up on the floor of the Senate and exclude Mr. JOHNSON from the privilege of entering the Senate Chamber.

Members of the committee said this afternoon that the statements of Mr. JOHNSON were so unwarranted that they would be justified in taking drastic action. At the same time they were hampered by the fact that any action against Mr. Johnson would result in the failure of antiprofiteering legislation at this session and that this legislation was imperatively needed.

After the House conferees were appointed I addressed the following letter to each one of the Senate conferees:

JUNE 19, 1918.

DEAR SIR: I write to advise you that on the 14th instant the House agreed to the request made by the Senate for a conference on H. R. 9248, the antiprofiteering rent bill, and that Messrs. CROSSER, of Ohio; CARY, of Wisconsin; and myself were appointed conferees on the part of the House. And, further, to advise you that we will meet the Senate conferees at such time and place that will be most agreeable to the Senate conferees.

In order to facilitate matters I am inviting the attention of each of the Senate conferees to some of the more important questions of difference which will arise in conference by sending in advance a list of questions inquiring as to the attitude of the Senate conferees concerning each. The questions mentioned are herewith inclosed.

Very truly, yours,

BEN JOHNSON.

In order that the House may be fully advised as to the whole matter, I will read the questions submitted to the Senate conferees.

The questions are as follows:

1. Are you unalterable in your purpose to create a rent administrator?

2. If so, are you unalterable in your purpose not to intrust the work with anyone unless he be a resident of the District of Columbia?

3. Are you unalterable in your purpose not to permit the President to select a rent administrator for the District of Columbia just as he selected a Food Administrator and Fuel Administrator, i. e., without your consent and approval?

4. Are you unalterable in your seeming purpose to permit profiteering in house rents by imposing a fine less than the amount of the profiteering; or, will you accept some plan like that recently suggested by the President in his message to Congress whereby all the money taken in a profiteering transaction shall be surrendered?

5. Are you unalterable in your adherence to that part of the Senate bill which would compel the tenant to leave his work as often and as long as it would be necessary for him to leave it in order to prosecute or defend the several appeals allowed?

6. Are you unalterable in your purpose not to fix a gross return to the landlord, but, instead, to give him a "net" return, notwithstanding the fact that thereby the landlord would have no interest whatever in keeping down the operating expenses of the premises?

7. Are you unalterable in your purpose to saddle upon the tenant the cost of permanent street and similar improvements to the real estate alone, notwithstanding the fact that the erstwhile tenant enjoys the building alone?

8. Are you unalterable in your purpose to compel the tenant to account for "vacancies" in the house and "depreciation" of the house; and not allow him to offset that by the growing increase in the value of the land upon which the house stands?

9. Are you unalterable in your purpose to permit a landlord to profiteer with a "business" house because it may once have been used as a residence?

10. Are you unalterable in your purpose to fasten the present annual rates of rental on the tenant by fixing the rates in effect on the 1st day of last October as a basis?

11. Are you unalterable in your purpose that the rental for furniture shall be as much as 30 per cent of its value?

12. Are you unalterable in your seeming purpose not to punish profiteering corporations to the same extent that you would individuals who profiteer?

13. Are you unalterable in your seeming purpose to exempt "the original landlord" from all the provisions of the bill by your definition of "landlord"?

14. If you are unalterable in your seeming purpose to adhere to the remedy of "fine" instead of that of "taxation," as set out in the bill passed by the House, would you be in favor of having a fine levied on all those who violate any provision of the act, or would you insist upon limiting it to those only who "evade or attempt to evade its provisions"?

Then after seeing the newspaper article just referred to I addressed to each of the conferees the following letter:

JUNE 21, 1918.

To the Senate conferees on House bill 9248, the antiprofiteering rent bill, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: The Washington newspapers of yesterday contained the statement that at least some of the Senate conferees on the antiprofiteering rent bill contemplate having me denied the privileges of the Senate floor because of the criticism made by me of the Senate amendment which has come to be known as the "Pomerene bill."

I do not care a continental about that; run along and get through with it, and then permit the Senate to vote on a measure that will prevent the profiteers from driving nearly a thousand war workers out of Washington every week. I am not interested in the least in your undertaking to deny me the privileges of the Senate Chamber, but I am deeply concerned for the war worker who is being robbed and then sent out of Washington, and because of which our boys in France must suffer.

The newspaper articles referred to state also that at least some of the Senate conferees may decline to go into conference because I am one of the House conferees. May I not suggest that by such a course, either intentionally or unintentionally, you play right into the hands of the profiteers, as delay in the passage of a good bill is what they seek?

May I not also suggest that your skins should be thicker or your bill better?

[Laughter and applause.]

I not only invite the severest criticism of all my official acts, but I am quite anxious, indeed, to have the acid test applied to my endeavors in this particular matter, and you will not only not offend me but you will do me a favor by wading into both me and it without gloves; since I, and not the landlords, am its author.

This is not a time for "senatorial dignity," but one for action. Rearing back on your "pastern joints" don't get the oppressed tenants anything. I do not intend to permit your attitude toward me, because of my criticism of your "rotten" bill, to in the least deter me in my efforts to prevent the profiteer from fattening off of our country's needs.

Your amendment—the Pomerene bill—had to be criticized, "senatorial dignity" to the contrary notwithstanding.

My contempt for such of you as may resort to pretext to evade full responsibility for not giving our war workers protection from the miserable profiteers is just as great as yours may be for me; but, as I said, that shall not stop me from following my plain duty in the premises.

Let us get to work on the bill, and then you can have your revenge on me to your hearts' content. You have my full consent to deny me the privileges of the Senate Chamber, or even to take your spite out of my hide, if you will only go ahead and let the Senate vote on a good bill instead of a subterfuge.

While I am sending this letter to each of the conferees, it is really intended for those only who are responsible for the article in yesterday afternoon's local newspapers.

Very truly, yours, BEN JOHNSON.

I take it for granted that the thought of "ousting" me from the Senate Chamber is the result of a close association with those who have been "ousting" the Government workers from houses in the District of Columbia. [Applause and laughter.]

FOURTEENTH AND SUBSEQUENT DECENNIAL CENSUSES.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11984) making provision for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses. Pending that motion, I would like to come to some agreement with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. NICHOLS] as to a limitation on the time for general debate.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any suggestion to make?

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that general debate be limited to two hours on a side, and inasmuch as one hour was consumed by me yesterday, that the gentleman from Michigan be allowed two hours, and that one hour be controlled by myself.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. That is satisfactory, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that further general debate on this bill shall be limited to three hours—one hour to be controlled by himself and two hours by the gentleman from Michigan. Is there objection?

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have intended for some time to ask unanimous consent to address the House on a subject not connected with the bill. I did not get a chance to speak to the gentleman in charge of the bill, and I would like to have 20 minutes from either side or both sides.

Mr. HELM. I further make the request that all debate be confined to the bill under consideration.

Mr. WALSH. I shall object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] wants 20 minutes out of that time. Can the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Michigan give him 20 minutes?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from New York does not wish to discuss the bill——

Mr. LONDON. No.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman from Kentucky desires that debate shall be limited to the bill which we are considering.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the remaining general debate on this bill be limited to three hours, two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. NICHOLS] and one hour by himself, and that debate be confined to the bill itself. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object to that provision confining debate to the bill itself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects to that clause. Is there objection to the rest of the request?

Mr. HELM. I withdraw the portion of the request limiting debate to the bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the gentleman from New York having 20 minutes, but I think that debate on the rest of it ought to be confined to the bill, and therefore I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects. The question is on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11984, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11984, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY].

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I greatly regret that in these busy hours, when we are engaged in great matters of state for the proper conduct of a world-wide war, and this House, weary with the many duties of a long session, is seeking for a little respite and recess from the hot summer months, that great war measures demanding our prompt attention should be pushed aside and disregarded, and it should have been thought necessary that this delay should come at this time in legislation and that this House should spend its time for many days in the discussion of an absurd, useless, and political piece of legislation.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield until I get my feet placed. [Laughter.]

It may seem strange in this war Congress, where "politics is adjourned," that a new member of the minority party and a member of the minority on a committee should have the temerity to make a minority report on a partisan bill. I do so that my position may be made so plain that I may not be accused of disloyalty to the administration. This bill is not only absurd and useless, but if enacted into law in its present form it will be the most vicious piece of legislation ever placed upon the statute books of this Nation.

When I received appointment as a member of the Committee on the Census I at once acquainted myself with its duties, and I found out very quickly that there was nothing to do for the reason that we had a permanent census law, enacted July 2, 1909, providing for the thirteenth and all subsequent decennial censuses, and I could not see why any new legislation was necessary; but at the commencement of this Congress the majority named a Census Committee, composed of the chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM], the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON], the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HOOD], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE], and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN], with one lone Democrat from the North, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VAN DYKE]. It was understood at the commencement of this war Congress that nothing but war measures should engage our attention, and that those committees that would of necessity have no work should not be organized or appoint a clerk, that thereby a saving might be made in Government expenses. Very early in the session the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] made a very commendable and earnest attempt to induce a spirit of economy in legislation, that we should devote ourselves only to war measures, and that the work of useless committees should be abolished, together with the expense of useless secretaries and clerks to such committees. I was surprised that he did not receive any support from the administration; but I was much more surprised, right after this fight of Mr. SANFORD'S, when the Committee on the Census was called together, organized, and a clerk appointed for that committee who could draw down some $2,000 a year. I did not object to this for the reason that other useless committees had had the same thing, and as it had become a custom, the custom would now soon become the law. I was still further surprised when this committee was again called together to hold extended hearings upon a bill to repeal the existing law providing for the next census. We commenced hearings on this bill February 20 last, which hearings continued up to April 10, all printed in a document of over 260 pages.

The only explanation for this bill, I think, is one that I might make plain by an illustration. Some years ago in the legislature of my State a chairman of one of these useless committees, with nothing to do, organized his committee, and after that he must have some work for his committee to justify its existence, so he presented a bill of no consequence, and after a hearing it was reported favorably from his committee. When it came before the house it was very apparent that it had no chance to pass, because it was so absurd and ridiculous. Finally, when he saw that his bill was not to go through, he arose and said, "Mr. Speaker, I am chairman of this committee. This is the only work we have had, and I am entitled to one bill under the custom of the legislature." And we gave him his one harmless bill out of courtesy, custom, and sympathy. I assume that the chairman of the Committee on the Census, who is the chairman of a useless committee, one that has nothing to do in this session of Congress, who has organized and got himself a clerk, must proceed still further and have one bill reported and passed at this session; and if it was possible and the legislation was harmless I would willingly agree that he should now have his one bill passed through this House.

If the chairman of the Census Committee had presented a bill to the committee and to this House amending the present census law by providing that the Fourteenth Census shall be restricted to inquiries relating to population, which said census shall be taken in accordance with the provisions of an act to provide for the Thirteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, approved

July 2, 1909, it would not have taken this House an hour to pass it unanimously.

Before our Committee on the Census there appeared the director, the Hon. Sam Rogers, of North Carolina, who claimed to have had the present bill prepared in his office, and asked us to favorably report the same. And after long hearings a majority of the committee complied with his request, scarcely changing anything material in the bill as originally presented by the director.

On March 6, 1902, this Congress established a permanent Census Bureau and office, appointed a director, office force, field force, details for their work, and provided for all the salaries and emoluments. On July 2, 1909, the Congress enacted a permanent census law to provide for the Thirteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, which is the existing law to-day. This is a law of 33 sections. It provides:

That a census of the population, agriculture, manufactures, and mines and quarries of the United States shall be taken by the Director of the Census in the year 1910 and every 10 years thereafter. The census herein provided for shall include each State and Territory on the mainland of the United States, the District of Columbia, and Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico.

That law further provides "that the Director of the Census shall, at least six months prior to the date fixed for commencing the enumeration of the Thirteenth and each succeeding decennial census, designate the number of supervisors," and so forth; and it goes on and provides that "the supervisors shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." It further provides that the decennial year for the taking of the census shall be "April 15 of the year in which the enumeration shall be made." It further provides "that the enumeration of the population required by section 1 of this act shall be taken as of the 15th day of April and it shall be the duty of each enumerator to commence the enumeration of his district on that day." And it further provides "that there shall be in the year 1915, and once every 10 years thereafter, a census of agriculture and live stock," and so forth, and making the full provisions for taking the same.

This existing law further provides for all the details of the work of the Census Office for the last and for the present census in 1920.

Now, that law was enacted 10 years ago at a session of Congress when the Republican Party had the majority and when it was necessary for a Republican President to invoke the veto, so that the census law might not be used for political purposes in removing the employees from under the civil-service law and not allowing the Senate of the United States to approve the supervisors.

The only apparent reason for changing the existing law at the present time seems to be to enlarge the office and field force of the Census Bureau and to increase the number of appointees and the salary list, to remove the safeguards in the matter of appointments, so that the President and the Congress shall have nothing to do with the matter of the selection of the supervisors and enumerators, but that these appointments shall be left to two well-known politicians.

It is admitted by the Census Bureau that if no new census bill shall be enacted the next census will be taken the same as the last, with the present office force, the same number of employees, supervisors, and enumerators, and with the same expense as the last census.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Would the gentleman be kind enough to repeat that again, namely, that it would be taken with the same expense and with no additional employees?

Mr. HERSEY. Under the existing law it is all provided for. Unless the existing law is changed, there will be no more expense added than there was in the Thirteenth Census.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. For a question.

Mr. ASWELL. I understood the gentleman to say that the census should be taken with the present force. Do you mean that?

Mr. HERSEY. The force provided under existing law.

Mr. ASWELL. The present force?

Mr. HERSEY. I do not mean the present office force. Of course, enumerators will be appointed and supervisors will be appointed under existing law. And if a new census bill is to be enacted, and it should be passed by July 2, 1919, it would be as early as the last one was that was enacted July 2, 1909. The only reason for the hysterical haste of the committee in forcing the present bill in this Congress is very apparent. The chairman of the Committee on the Census, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM], on June 18, this week, said in the House that if this bill is not passed at this session it will be impossible to pass it at this Congress. Well, we are only to have a short recess, if we have any. We will be back here in August to pass the revenue bill. Congress will be in regular session next December, and if this bill is passed in a year from now it will be passed as soon as it was passed 10 years ago. The chairman of this committee knew full well that after the November elections no such bill as this could possibly pass the next Congress, as it will then be constituted.

Now, one of the most objectionable features of such legislation as is provided by this bill is the attempt on the part of certain departments, bureaus, and organizations to use the war as an excuse for enlarging their departments, their bureaus, and commissions, forming new commissions, departments, and bureaus, and in that way finding new opportunities for office-holders, increasing the salaries, and building up a great machine, while the members of such bureaus, departments, and organizations engage in an earnest rivalry with all other departments of the Government to see which one shall get the largest benefits from the unfortunate and unhappy conditions growing out of the war. The present census bill, under consideration, is an apt illustration of an attempt of a bureau of this Government to take advantage of the miseries of war. Let me call your attention to a few of the most radical changes made in the existing law by the present bill.

The scope of the census has been greatly enlarged by adding to the bill Guam and Samoa and by adding to the census forestry and forest products. It seems to me that during this period of the war, when every energy and resource of the Nation is taxed to the uttermost, that we ought not to go to the expense of making a census of anything except the population, which could easily be done under existing law by the present office force and by the present field force provided under the present law without any extra expense than that which is provided by the existing law.

In my minority report I have called attention to some recent special censuses of our industries that have been taken by the Census Bureau and other bureaus and agencies of the Government. I wish to again call your attention to a few of the many censuses that have been recently taken by the Government in every possible field except population.

A complete census of manufactures was taken, compiled, and published by the Census Bureau in August, 1916. Since this census was taken all industries have been completely disorganized by war.

In 1916 the Census Bureau made and published a complete census of transportation by water, giving detailed statistics as to number, tonnage, value, ownership, employees, wages, amount of business done, etc., for the various classes of craft; also the operation of fishing vessels.

In 1916 a complete census of shipbuilding was made by the Census Bureau, giving, by coast districts and inland waters, separate statistics for steel and wooden vessels launched during the years 1914 and 1916 according to gross and net tonnage.

In 1917 a complete census of electrical industries was made by the Census Bureau covering central electric light and power stations, street and electric railways, telephones, telegraph, and municipal electric fire-alarm and police-patrol signaling systems.

During the fiscal year 1917 the Census Bureau collected complete vital statistics.

During the year 1917 the Census Bureau completed financial statistics of cities of the Nation.

During March, 1917, the Census Bureau completed financial statistics of States.

During the fiscal year 1917 the Census Bureau completed cotton and tobacco statistics.

In addition to these special censuses the bureau during the year 1917 completed statistics and census of the blind, deaf and dumb, negroes, prisoners and juvenile delinquents, religious bodies, marriage and divorce, monograph of cancer, occupational statistics, statistics on distribution, edible vegetable oils, executive civil service, life tables, statistical directory of State institutions, and many other special censuses too numerous to mention.

The Bureau of Labor has recently taken and compiled complete statistics of the labor of the country.

The Census Bureau has recently been much enlarged and increased in its efficiency by the addition of computing machines, pantograph punches, automatic tabulating machines, automatic punches, card-sorting machines, card-counting machines, and all the other modern devices that can be used in such a bureau. The regular force in the Census Bureau is 1,366, and the expense of the bureau for 1917 was $1,213,036.53.

The present war has of necessity called for emergency censuses of varied industries, to wit:

(1) A food-survey bill, approved August 10, 1917, "To investigate and ascertain the demand for, the supply, consumption, costs, and prices of and the basic facts relating to the ownership, production, transportation, manufacture, storage, and distribution of foods, food materials, feeds, seeds, fertilizer, agricultural implements and machinery, and any article required in connection with the production, distribution, or utilization of food."

(2) Census of food and fuel of the country, coal, and other products, authorized by the act to increase the production, conserve the supply, and control the distribution of food products and fuel, approved August 10, 1917.

(3) The act to authorize exploration for and disposition of potassium, approved October 2, 1917, to prospect for chlorides, sulphates, carbonates, borates, silicates, or nitrates of potassium on public lands of the United States.

(4) Under the powers of the Shipping Board special surveys of the forests of the country have been undertaken and completed.

(5) The Department of Agriculture, a very efficient arm of the Government, has received large appropriations and is furnishing the Nation with monthly reports of agricultural products, crops planted, and amount produced; animal industry, meat production of the country, under the Bureau of Animal Industry; plant industry, investigation of plant diseases, and also a full census of all the national forests of the country, as well as a census in the Bureau of Soils, Bureau of Entomology, Bureau of Biological Survey, Bureau of Crop Estimates, Bureau of Public Roads, Bureau of Markets "for acquiring and diffusing among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with the marketing and distributing of farm and nonmanufactured food products and the purchasing of farm supplies, independently and in cooperation with other branches of the department, State agencies, purchasing and consuming organizations, and persons engaged in the transportation, marketing, and distribution of farm and food products"; also "to make investigation relating to the production, transportation, storage, preparation, marketing, manufacture, and distribution of agricultural food products, including the extent, manner, and methods of any manipulation of the markets or control of the visible supply of such food products, or any of them, by any individuals, groups, associations, combinations, or corporations"; also "for investigating, demonstrating, and promoting the use of standards for the different grades, qualities, and conditions of cotton, and for investigating the ginning, grading, stapling, baling, marking, compressing, and tare of cotton."

The Congress has recently enacted a bill to make a survey of all the mineral resources of the country, mines and mining, in connection with the Geological Survey.

We have just passed a bill to provide in the Department of Agriculture "for gathering authoritative information in connection with the demand for and the production, supply, distribution, and utilization of food, and otherwise carrying out the purposes of section 2 of the act; extending and enlarging the market news service; and enlarging the informational work of the Department of Agriculture; and printing and distributing emergency leaflets, posters, and other publications requiring quick issue or large editions."

We have a multitude of bureaus, boards, and commissions that are monthly collecting statistics and information necessary for the conduct of the war, and it seems to me that a complete census of all the industries of the war during war time would not only be an added expense of millions but would be a duplication of the work that has already been done under emergency legislation as above set forth.

The census of 1920 would not be completed in time to be of any especial value to us until about 1922 or 1923, and while the Nation is putting forth its supreme effort in a mighty sacrifice to raise money to carry on the war we ought not to waste the resources of the people in making a useless census or in duplicating the work of the above bureaus.

This bill would increase the number of supervisors from 330 to 400, and these supervisors will have the appointment of all the enumerators, one from every town and city in the Nation, and many more than one from each city—a mighty force of at least 200,000. Such an increase to take a full census in this time of war would be utterly without excuse and could only be explained as a political necessity.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Do you think they are not necessary? Do you think that that number of enumerators is not necessary?

Mr. HERSEY. You mean the number we have now?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No. I mean the number the gentleman has just stated.

Mr. HERSEY. That number might be necessary if we were to take a full census of everything provided in this bill.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. HERSEY. I will yield just for a question.

Mr. HELM. How can you have a less number of enumerators if you take a census of the population than if you take a census of agriculture and manufactures when, as a matter of fact, the census of manufactures is taken by the field agents and not by the enumerators?

Mr. HERSHEY. In answer to the question of the gentleman I will say that if you take nothing but the population it will be a very small job that can be done by the present office and field force without any additional expense; simply its own annual expense; they now take an annual census of almost everything.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. I yield.

Mr. ASWELL. I merely wanted to be sure that the gentleman said that the census of the population could be taken by the present force.

Mr. HERSEY. With the present force provided by the existing law.

Mr. LANGLEY and Mr. LAZARO rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HERSEY. I will yield first to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LANGLEY. I want to understand the gentleman. Is it the gentleman's contention that we ought to have a census of population only?

Mr. HERSEY. We must have a census of the population.

Mr. LANGLEY. And it is the gentleman's opinion that we should go no further than that?

Mr. HERSEY. Yes. If the gentleman will read my report he will see that that is my opinion.

Mr. LAZARO. One of the best spokesmen among our allies said the other day that this is a war of our resources. That being true, how can we know what our resources are unless a census is taken of them?

Mr. HERSEY. I think we should know what our resources are, but if we keep on spending money for useless projects and useless bureaus and useless inquiries we will have no resources from which to pay the expense. [Laughter.]

This bill calls for 15 additional experts at $2,000 each. Everyone knows that the bureau contains now a great many experienced clerks who have been there from 20 to 25 years. There are in the Census Bureau 1,366 employees, with all modern helps and contrivances, everything that science can produce to aid them in their work. A "statistical expert" in the Census Bureau is simply a clerk who knows how to use the adding machine and knows how to compile statistics from the blanks returned from the field force. These statistical tables are largely the work of the ordinary clerk in the office, and "statistical experts" only a name under which it is sought to secure new appointees at high salaries and take care of the political driftwood that seeks at this time office of some kind in Washington. There is no reason why compensation and salaries should be raised at this time. Those employees, as well as the employees of all the departments, have had their compensation increased under the laws that we have recently enacted.

Now, this bill provides for an increase of expense in the office force in Washington of $190,000. There is no estimate of the expenses of the new force of supervisors and enumerators, which will of itself constitute a mighty army.

The change in the date of taking the census is made, no doubt, to furnish some excuse for the hastening of this bill, so that it would be passed at the present session of Congress under the claim that the period has thereby been shortened by some four months. The present law provides that the census shall be taken as of April 15, 1920. If you read the evidence before the committee, you will be satisfied that that is the proper time to take a census, and if we take population only it would comply with the Constitution, as it would be exactly 10 years from the last census, which was taken as of April 15, 1910.

Now, the most radical change in the existing law, one that ought forever to condemn this bill, is found in the attempt to remove the appointment and approval of supervisors from the President and the Congress and place all these appointments in the hands of two well-known politicians here in Washington, who will, no doubt, see to it that only "the faithful" secure the offices and the spoils.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is that the language of the law—"two well-known politicians"?

Mr. HERSEY. It is the intent of the bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I want the language. Of course, the gentleman is speaking with entire accuracy, because he is making a great speech. Is that the language of the law—"two well-known politicians"?

Mr. HERSEY. It is not the language of the law, but it is the intent of the bill. The bill has not become a law yet, I hope.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman's speech is somewhat confusing to me. I have been trying to follow it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HERSEY. I have no doubt of it. [Laughter.] Ever since the beginning of the history of the Government or the history of the Census Bureau supervisors have been appointed by the President of the United States and have been approved by the Senate of the United States. Why? The President appoints the supervisors, the same as he appoints postmasters, revenue officers, and commissioned officers in the Army and Navy, and they must all be approved by the Senate of the United States.

In the past all the supervisors have been appointed by the President, and these appointments have all gone to the Senate for confirmation and approval. The Senators from each State and the Representatives from each congressional district have always presented to the President names of men from their States or districts whom they recommended as proper supervisors—candidates who would have the respect and confidence of the people of their State. By this method we have in the past secured men of character, men of standing, men in whom the people had faith, men who were reliable in making a faithful census. I can not imagine, gentlemen, anything that could be more vicious in legislation at the present time than to allow the supervisors, who have the appointment of all the enumerators, this mighty army, to be appointed and approved by two men who are, I say, politicians, and from whose decision and approval there is no appeal or veto, and to remove such appointments from even the President of the United States, and to deny the Senate the right to approve these men who have such a responsibility and who have such a power and such an opportunity to use their office to do political work for those who appointed them to these places of profit.

Now, it should be said of the Democratic Party that it is free from the accusation of originality. I think a Democratic politician can safely say, in the language of Watts's hymn—

There is nothing original in me except original sin.

The Democratic Party has always imitated the vices of the Republican Party, but never any of its virtues. When the bill providing for the Thirteenth and the present census was before Congress in 1909 the Republican Party, then in power in the Nation, attempted to secure some political advantage by removing the employees of the Census Bureau from under the civil service and providing that the President should appoint the supervisors without the approval of the Senate. It is very interesting to note that 10 years ago the Democratic Party, then in the minority, made a very strenuous fight against this attempt of the Republican Party to get some political advantage in the Census Bureau and out of the last census. The Democrats then were right in opposing with all their might such an attempt to play politics with the census. They denounced then in strong and unmeasured terms what they called the cheap politics of the Republicans, who sought to deprive the Senate of the right to approve the appointment of the supervisors. What was then a vice and a weakness on the part of the Republicans is now a virtue and statesmanship on the part of the Democrats; only the Democrats, to use the language of the street, have gone the Republicans "one better." They now provide in this bill that not even the President shall appoint the supervisors, but that they shall all be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce on the recommendation of the Director of the Census. Inspired no doubt by the declaration of the President that "politics is adjourned" in this Congress, there is to be nevertheless political work done in the campaign of 1920 by more than 200,000 of these supervisors and enumerators scattered all over the Nation. The President and the Congress are to have no responsibility. That is laid upon the shoulders of two well-known politicians, the Secretary of Commerce and the Director of the Census.

Mr. Redfield, the Secretary of Commerce, has, during his term of office, used every opportunity to favor Democratic free trade and to obtain every partisan advantage for his political party in the Nation. The Director of the Census, Hon. Sam L. Rogers, of North Carolina, was a political power in the Democratic councils of his State before his appointment as Director of the Census. He was recognized at home as one who could see to it that the white vote had all its rights and that the colored vote should obtain no unfair advantage. And while these two shrewd and keen politicians may exercise this great power given them under this bill in a disinterested and nonpartisan manner, it is well for us all to remember that the age of miracles is past and that human nature remains unchanged, especially in the Democratic Party.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman intend to send that speech to his district?

Mr. HERSEY. I do. Josh Billings said, "If a horse jockey don't lie, he loses one of his blessed privileges," and if the honorable Secretary of Commerce and the honorable Director of the Census under this bill do not see to it that there are over 200,000 political appointees sent out in 1920 all over this Nation to take the census and at the same time spread the faith and direct the presidential campaign, then they will miss their blessed privilege.

Now, I will say that I do not oppose this bill on the ground that it is giving a political advantage to the Democratic Party. I would have opposed it just the same if such a bill were to come from the Republican Party. I do not believe these great bureaus and departments of the Government should be used to further party ends, and I do not believe in putting temptation before the Democratic Party, as they might forget that politics had been "adjourned" in this Congress.

I wish to say, in conclusion, that these are the darkest days in the history of the Republic. The burden of the defense of civilization in a great world war has been laid upon the shoulders of this Nation. To win this war we must make a careful husbandry of all our resources. We must exhaust our man power, we must tax our people to the very limit, we must save and sacrifice and suffer as never before, and in these dark days of the Nation's destiny it is no time to spend with a lavish and reckless hand the hard-earned money of a patient people. This is not a suitable occasion for the erection of expensive public buildings and an enlargement on a vast scale of bureaus and departments in Washington. It is not the proper day to greatly increase salaries or multiply opportunities for political jobs. At this hour, when the President has notified the world that "politics has been adjourned in the American Congress," it is a poor time to permit two active politicians to appoint over 200,000 political workers to be paid big salaries out of the Treasury of the United States and to be sent out into the Nation in the presidential campaign of 1920 to make the country safe for the Democratic Party. Let us be honest with each other and "adjourn" politics in deed as well as in word and "save to win" by commencing here at the Capital in Washington. [Applause.]

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD. I shall not occupy a great deal of time.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. IGOE). The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate for the gentleman from Maine to make the kind of speech he has just made, for the reason that it is known by every member of this committee that during the past three or four months, while we have been working faithfully upon the bill, the gentleman from Maine is the first one to mention politics in connection with it. Politics of a great political machine which he says will be created is very unfortunate, for the reason that the passage of a similar bill 10 years ago by a Republican Congress would not bear very careful investigation.

I would like to call the attention of the committee to a few facts as to the delay 10 years ago that the gentleman seems now so anxious about.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. I will.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman says the bill of 10 years ago would not bear very close inspection. The gentleman will recall that it provided that the appointments should be made outside the civil service and that a Republican President vetoed the bill.

Mr. ASWELL. I regret exceedingly that my good friend from Kentucky called my attention to that fact, for that forces me to give him some of the reasons why President Roosevelt vetoed it.

Mr. LANGLEY. I know what they were, and I have my own private opinion on that question.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The bill was reenacted and the appointments were made outside of the civil service just the same.

Mr. LANGLEY. I do not recall that this was the case, but my recollection is that the civil-service law was sometimes evaded, and usually to the betterment of the service.

Mr. ALEXANDER. They were all made in that way.

Mr. LANGLEY. Well, I do not know as I was not connected with the bureau at that time.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. What was the date of the passage of the bill 10 years ago, was it 2 years prior to the taking of the census?

Mr. ASWELL. It became a law two days after the census period began. It was July 2, 1909. The census period began July 1.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. What was the date of the passage of the first bill?

Mr. ASWELL. The date of the passage of the last bill was July 2, 1909. The first bill was vetoed by the President in February.

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, no; it was vetoed in March.

Mr. LANGLEY. No; it was February 5.

Mr. HELM. It was vetoed February 5, 1909.

Mr. LANGLEY. That is correct.

Mr. ASWELL. If gentlemen will give attention I shall read the RECORD.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. I will.

Mr. KEARNS. If the bill of 10 years ago was passed in January, 1909, what is the use of passing this bill in June, 1918?

Mr. ASWELL. That is a good question and I shall answer it. The delay in the passage of that bill prevented any preliminary plans, arrangements, and preparations for taking the census. A resolution was passed appropriating $50,000 in a general way to enable the director to undertake the preparation. The estimate made by the director was $12,900,000. After these delays began the estimate was raised to thirteen and one-half million dollars. The work dragged on in a haphazard way, with all sorts of useless and needless expenditures, because of lack of organization, resulting in four additional appropriations to complete the census. They raised the original estimate from about $13,000,000 up to $16,000,000 before the census was completed. Not only that, but it was exactly two years after the three-year period ended before the census figures were collected and the work completed.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman is referring to the Thirteenth Census, I take it.

Mr. ASWELL. I am referring to the last census. In other words, the delay in the passage of the bill cost this Government nearly $3,000,000 and delayed the whole work for exactly two years.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. How does the gentleman know that it was the delay that caused that? This is the first time I ever heard that statement.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is what the director and the heads of the bureaus in the department state.

Mr. GILLETT. Where is that stated?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is in the hearings.

Mr. ASWELL. If the gentleman will permit me, Director Durand, who was at that time Director of the Census, makes the statement.

Mr. LANGLEY. And that is based on the unusual fact that the Thirteenth Census act that finally became a law was passed many months later than any previous act, and this was due to the veto by the President of the previous bill.

Mr. ASWELL. Some 15 months later.

Mr. LANGLEY. In that connection I desire to state that I was connected with the organization of the Twelfth Census, which was then a temporary institution, and, of course, had to be organized from the very ground up. The Twelfth Census law was approved March 3, 1899, which was several months later, speaking comparatively, than it is now proposed to pass the Fourteenth Census act. That was one of the best censuses ever taken, I think, and yet the act was passed over nine months nearer to the beginning of the decennial-census period than it is now proposed to pass this act.

Mr. ASWELL. There is no doubt about it being one of the best if the gentleman was connected with it.

Mr. LANGLEY. I thank my friend for that compliment. The argument was made then that if we had a permanent census office so that we would have a skeleton organization which could be expanded and contracted as necessities required, they could do the work very much more expeditiously. That is an unanswerable argument, it seems to me, why there is no necessity for this haste by commencing so far ahead and passing this legislation so much earlier than we passed it when we had only a temporary institution. I do not wish to be understood as opposing the bill, but I would like to have the gentleman's views on that point.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes.

Mr. HELM. The Twelfth Census was the census of 1900, and it provided for the establishment of a permanent Census Bureau, and the gentleman's argument is that because a permanent census was arranged for the following census should be taken more rapidly. The Thirteenth Census was taken in 1910, and it was such an abject failure that the director himself was forced to resign. The bureau was organized in 1899.

Mr. LANGLEY. I do not recall why he resigned, but the Twelfth Census act did not provide for a permanent census office. That was done later.

Mr. HELM. And you had the experience from there up to 1910, and with all the benefit of all the experience and the organization, yet by reason of the failure to pass the bill providing for the Thirteenth Census until July 2, 1909, after the decennial period had begun——

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; that was the difficulty. The passage of the act was delayed too long.

Mr. HELM. There was confusion from start to finish.

Mr. LANGLEY. That is unquestionably true.

Mr. HELM. And it culminated in the resignation of the director.

Mr. LANGLEY. I do not recall why he resigned. The confusion was due to the delay resulting from the President's veto, putting the legislation over until the next Congress.

Mr. HELM. That was the delay in passing the bill authorizing the taking of the census.

Mr. LANGLEY. That is so; but the point that I make is that the Twelfth Census was successful, although it was a temporary organization without the advantage of a permanent force.

Mr. ASWELL. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the census with which he was connected, which fact made it a success undoubtedly, was provided for 15 months prior to the census period.

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; that was March 3, 1899; much later than you are proposing to pass this bill.

Mr. ASWELL. The minority report by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY] and his speech this morning may be summarized in this one statement—Why take the census during this administration; why not leave it for the next administration? and that will probably give us a chance. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to this record. It was reported by some and believed by many, during the discussion of this bill 10 or 12 years ago, that it was understood that the taking of that census and the patronage connected therewith would be held up and be used in the nomination and election of another President. It was reported by some and believed by many that President Roosevelt had some interest at least, though very remote possibly, in the selection of Mr. Taft, and that that played a large part in the delay in the passage of that bill.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. Not for the present. The record is that when this bill finally passed Mr. Roosevelt vetoed it and delivered the whole question of patronage to Mr. Taft. I am not criticizing Mr. Roosevelt. He is a good soldier, and he delivers the goods all the time, and he did in that case. This is well known by gentlemen on both sides of the House. I call the attention of the committee to the fact that this question involves at this time a business proposition, that if there ever was a time in the history of this Republic when the business of the country should be organized and systematized, when inventories should be made so that the Government can utilize its resources and keep the country moving forward with power, influence, and efficiency, that time is now, and it is, to my mind, the most absurd proposition imaginable to intimate in this time of war that we do not need any census of the agricultural resources of the country, the mines, the quarries, and the lumber industry. All the resources of the country should be brought together, organized, and put in the grasp of this Government so that we may know where we are and what we are doing. Think of it! Germany takes an actual count of her food resources, her live stock, every three months in the year. Germany, that no one denies is efficient, goes to the enormous expense of taking an actual count of all her resources every three months during this war, and her population is counted every year. It is not a guess, it is not an estimate, but is an actual count, piece by piece, individual by individual. That seems to me to be a suggestion upon which I could dwell for an hour, to show the seriousness of taking this entire population, resources and all, at this particular time. The charge is made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY] that this bill is absurd, because it merely proposes an enlargement of things. It is reasonable to state that our resources have increased at least 30 per cent as a minimum and our manufacturing industries have increased 200 per cent, and it will require more in men and numbers to take an accurate census, greater expenditure of money to get hold of the condition that we are enjoying to-day. We should thank God we are enjoying a condition of such prosperity, enabling us to handle ourselves efficiently and keep our place in the world.

Mr. Chairman, it has been claimed also that the time of the taking of this census is wrong. That is not to my mind worthy of discussion but for a moment. It is understood that the committee that worked upon it—some of them have been in the bureau for 25 years—after investigating every detail, found that the business of the country is more nearly concluded on the 1st day of January than at any other period of the year; that more men, boys, and women can get away from their ordinary duties, can get away from their colleges and schools during the first two or three weeks of January than any other period of the year. People who want to work during the summer vacation do not want to work for only three weeks, as this bill will require, but they will want a whole summer's work if any at all. It finds people at home. The 1st of January finds businesses completed, it finds a time when the multiplication of live stock is not as rapid, it finds a better opportunity for young men in the colleges and schoolboys to do two or three weeks' work. These enumerators have only about three weeks' work, and I presume gentlemen on this floor will undertake to claim that they should do it under civil service for appointment. Who would ask for a civil-service examination to apply for a job that lasts three weeks? That proposition is too absurd.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the proposition is presented here by the gentleman from Maine that these supervisors should be appointed as of old. Ah, gentlemen of this committee, I would have you remember the fact that 10 years ago in this country in ordinary times would mean now 50 years ago. We can not discuss the conditions of this country to-day in the language or terms we discussed them 10 years ago. This is a time of wonderful development. This is a business proposition; it is not a political game, as the gentleman would have you believe. The Senate of the United States will in all likelihood not be in session. The President is burdened already with overwork in war responsibilities and duties. Why should this, then, be carried as a political scheme of the Senate and not handled and settled entirely as a business proposition by those who are responsible for its execution? That is all that is necessary to say at this moment upon that question.

It has been claimed also by the gentleman from Maine, or he intimates, that there is a lot of duplication in the Bureau of the Census and in the other departments of the Government. I call attention to this fact that the Bureau of the Census is the only governmental agency in existence that actually takes a detailed account. These other organizations or governmental agencies, such as the Department of Agriculture, the Food Administration, and those organizations and bureaus, take a census, of course, but base their estimates upon the actual count of the last census, and they gather most of their information by correspondence, and the result is it is almost impossible to get anything that is of very great value as to accuracy.

It is easy to be understood how difficult it is for any of these estimates to be made unless a count is made at least within a period of 10 years, and my personal opinion is the actual census should be taken every two years. The Department of Agriculture takes, for instance, the census of 1910 and then brings in their reports from over the country month by month or week by week, and these estimates when gathered lead the officials of the Department of Agriculture to conclude the crop this year is such and such a per cent of the crop last year when we had a count or census. So the reports go out that the crop this year is of such and such a quantity. Next year the same reports come in and they are based upon the percentage of the preceding year and not upon the original basis, but upon the preceding year, being the nearest period of time to estimate upon. The result is that from year to year these estimates get one, two, three, four, and nine years away from the facts, and if there is an error made in one year that error grows wider and wider with succeeding years. Now, then, gentlemen, to my mind it is seriously important to have in mind that the Bureau of the Census is the only organization that actually takes a literal count in making a census of our products, population, and all of our resources. That seems to me to be worthy of your consideration. I call your attention to the urgency of this bill, so that in this census period, beginning next June, 1919, we give the Director of the Census a business position, so that as you would want your farm handled or a merchandise establishment handled, you permit him to know exactly what his resources are, what the requirements are, and enable him to organize his force so that he can do this work efficiently. This is patent on its face, we need not discuss it. This bill carries only about $17,000,000 for all these censuses of all these activities. The last census of 1910 cost this Government $16,000,000, so that you will see that with all our increased industries that is a very reasonable increase in appropriation. Besides that, if you take only the population it will cost over $10,000,000, and the others will cost over $10,000,000, and if you take all of them separately they will cost $25,000,000 before you are through. If you take a census of population and leave the industries out it will not be six months before this very House will pass a bill calling for a census of some industry, and one by one, piecemeal, we will spend at least $25,000,000. The proposition we have now before us systematically planned and organized will permit the Director of the Census to do the work efficiently, thoroughly, and accurately.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. I will yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not that the present policy, and has it not been the policy ever since the Bureau of the Census was created a permanent bureau for it to be occupied during that period of the decade when not actually engaged in the taking of the census of population in the taking of a census of various other activities, for instance, taking a census of manufactures in the mid-period?

Mr. ASWELL. Not unless directed so to do by the Congress.

Mr. STAFFORD. At the present time in our legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill we provide for activities every year for the Census Bureau in taking the census of various subjects.

Mr. ASWELL. You mean for the regularly organized force?

Mr. STAFFORD. For the regularly organized force.

Mr. ASWELL. Yes; there is a very much larger force.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, the problem before the bureau and before the Congress has been how to keep this permanent force occupied during the period when it was not engaged in the enumeration of population. We have kept them employed by designating certain fields of investigation during the other years. What objection is there to having these statistics of manufactures taken later on? That is the policy the Appropriations Committee has pursued so far as this Bureau of Census is concerned.

Mr. ASWELL. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that there is no thought in the mind of the Director of Census or the Census Bureau or the committee to dismiss or discharge the regular force. On the other hand, the thought is that all of this census work that is being done by other departments should more and more be brought into the Census Bureau, where it belongs.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the question before the House is whether the statistics, if taken at the present time, in these abnormal conditions, will be of any value.

Mr. ASWELL. There is not any such question in my mind or in the mind of anybody else who is seriously concerned in the welfare of the country.

Mr. STAFFORD. These statistics have very little or no value toward winning the war. Would not they be of more value taken in normal times?

Mr. KEARNS. The gentleman from Louisiana, in response to a question as to the apparent haste of this bill, gave a very plausible answer, the only answer I have heard. If the history given by him of the last census is true, it is a very sufficient reason. There is another question that has been brought up, and the gentleman's answer was not very extended and not very satisfactory, to my mind, as to why the appointing power is taken from the President as to supervisors of the census and put in another arm of the Government.

Mr. ASWELL. I would answer that question by asking the gentleman why the President and Senate should have anything to do with it?

Mr. KEARNS. They always have, and it seems to me to be the present law; and the very fact that we put another burden on the President does not seem to be a sufficient reason, because every law that we pass authorizes the President to do so and so.

Mr. ASWELL. Does the gentleman believe because it has always been done that way it should now be done that way?

Mr. KEARNS. What is the reason for changing it? The gentleman has not given any reason yet.

Mr. ASWELL. The reason has been given from time to time, and was given by the gentleman yesterday. The Senate will not likely be in session, and the taking of the census is a simple but serious business matter, and should not be made a political football.

Mr. KEARNS. The Senate will be in session from next December.

Mr. ASWELL. The period begins in June.

Mr. KEARNS. When?

Mr. ASWELL. Next year.

Mr. KEARNS. But it will be in session from next December on until March, or longer.

Mr. STAFFORD. As long as the war continues Congress will be in session without any recess of more than two months. It will have to be.

Mr. ASWELL. If I may be permitted, I shall proceed without further interruption.

The Bureau of the Census, now the greatest statistical office in the world, represents the outgrowth and development of a century and a quarter of periodical and, in recent years, continuous statistical inquiry on the part of the Federal Government.

Less than a decade after the American Colonies had achieved their independence, and within a year from the date of the inauguration of President Washington and the assembling of the First Congress of the United States, there was begun the first enumeration of the population of this country. The constitutional requirement of a decennial census is found in Article I, section 3, which reads in part:

Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons. The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States and within every subsequent term of 10 years, in such manner as they shall by law direct.

Thus the United States was the first among the nations to make constitutional or legal provision for a regular periodical enumeration of its inhabitants.

The First Census, taken in 1790, related solely to population, and its scope, although very limited, was somewhat greater than that required by the constitutional provision just quoted. The name of the head of each family was taken, together with the total number of persons in the family, classified as free or slave. The free persons were further classified as white or other, the free whites as male or female, and the free white males as 16 or over, or under 16.

Subsequently, from time to time the field covered by the census has been still further enlarged, until it now embraces detailed inquiries along 17 distinct lines, made at decennial, quinquennial, biennial, annual, quarterly, and monthly intervals, in addition to various special inquiries ordered by the President or by Congress.

What is the value of census statistics?

It is true of every sort of social change, whether of progress or decline, that the steps are imperceptible to the unaided vision of those who, as legislators or administrators in the face of existing conditions of infinite complexity in their origin and interdependence, mold public policy. To determine the direction and extent of these changes requires the survey of a long period of time. It requires accurate measurements which embrace the full detail of social phenomena, and it is the proper function of a great statistical laboratory, by assembling the data of social phenomena, to make this survey, and by so doing to extend the scope and power of vision of those who are at any given time directing the trend of social forces. In the records of such a laboratory the growth of a nation is epitomized, and in its current work the imperceptible changes which are taking place are accurately determined.—Dr. John Cummings.

The development of statistics are causing history to be rewritten. Till recently the historian studied nations in the aggregate and gave us only the story of princes, dynasties, sieges, and battles. Of the people themselves—the great social body, with life, growth, forces, elements, and laws of its own—he told us nothing. Now statistical inquiry leads him into hovels, homes, workshops, mines, fields, prisons, hospitals, and all other places where human nature displays its weakness and its strength. In these explorations he discovers the needs of national growth and decay and thus becomes the prophet of his generation.

The chief instrument of American statistics is the census, which should accomplish a twofold object. It should serve the country by making a full and accurate exhibit of the elements of national life and strength, and it should serve the science of statistics by so exhibiting general results that they may be compared with similar data obtained by other nations. The census is indispensable to modern statesmanship.—Hon. James A. Garfield.

No general census law was ever enacted by any Congress within less than a year of the date of the census previous to the legislation enacted for the last, or Thirteenth Census. The bill for the taking of the Thirteenth Census was introduced in Congress in accordance with the recommendation of Director North, of the Bureau of the Census, early in the session, but was not passed by Congress until January 28, 1909. This bill was vetoed by President Roosevelt for reasons well known by those who observed the political maneuvers of Republican politicians of that time. Two months later, on March 4, 1909, Hon. William H. Taft was inaugurated President of the United States. A special session of the Sixty-first Congress was called and an act providing for the Thirteenth Census was passed on July 2, 1909. The three-year period provided for the Thirteenth Census began July 1, 1909, and ended June 30, 1912. It may be noted that the legislation providing for the Thirteenth Decennial Census did not become a law until after the beginning of the decennial census period. The law as passed was amended on August 5, 1909; by joint resolution on February 15, 1910; by the act of February 25, 1910; and again by joint resolution on March 24, 1910. The delay in providing the necessary legislation for the decennial census resulted in an insufficient allowance of time for the officials of the bureau to prepare for the enumeration and do the necessary preliminary work previous to the tabulation of results if the work was to be completed within the decennial census period. It became necessary to do things hurriedly, which resulted at the very beginning in delay, congestion, and much needless expenditure of money.

Dr. Durand, who was the Director of the Census at that time, stated that the passage of the census act at so late a date allowed little time for the heavy task of organizing the field force and preparing the schedules. At each of the three previous censuses the census act was prepared by Congress at least 15 months before the date of enumeration. Had it not been for the fact that the Census Bureau was a permanent organization, having already in its employ a number of officials and clerks experienced in the work of prior censuses, it would have been practically impossible to make the arrangements for the taking of the census under the provision of the law.

The taking of a decennial census is the largest single piece of work done by the United States Government during peace times. Delay in the passage of the act makes it impossible to even estimate approximately the cost of the undertaking. Director North submitted an estimate of $12,930,000 as the approximate cost of the Thirteenth Census. Later, as the field work was completed and the office work begun, Director Durand raised the previous estimate to a total of $14,500,000. Both estimates proved to be too low. The Thirteenth Census was not completed during the census period which ended June 30, 1912. During that period Congress appropriated $15,150,000 for the Thirteenth Census work. On March 4, 1909, the Congress appropriated $150,000 for preliminary work; on June 29, 1909, an appropriation of $10,000,000 was made. These two appropriations were made previous to the passage of the law. On June 17, 1910, an appropriation of $2,000,000 was made and again on March 4, 1911, $2,500,000, and on December 22, 1911, $500,000 were appropriated. At the end of the census period the work of the bureau was very much delayed and congested. In fact, the work of the Thirteenth Census was not entirely completed until the year 1914. The legislative, executive, and judicial act, approved August 23, 1912, carried $292,000 for completing the Thirteenth Census. Again, the appropriations of 1912 and 1913, in addition to the amounts previously appropriated, carried an item of $426,665 for miscellaneous work of the Thirteenth Census. Therefore the total cost of the Thirteenth Census, from its beginning until its final completion in 1914—two years beyond the end of the decennial-census period—was approximately $16,000,000. Some of this money was expended uselessly and unnecessarily because of the delay in the passage of legislation providing for the census, which caused congestion and a waste of effort and time.

ANALYSIS OF THIS BILL.

The bill now before the House has been drafted to provide the force, resources, machinery, and equipment needed for taking a prompt, efficient, and accurate census. It provides for the appointment of approximately 85,000 enumerators, who are to canvass every dwelling in the United States and record the facts as to age, sex, nativity, illiteracy, occupation, and so forth, for every individual man, woman, and child included in a population of over 100,000,000; also the facts as to acreage, crops, tenure, and values for more than 7,000,000 farms. It not only covers continental United States, but also Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, Guam, Samoa, and the Panama Canal Zone. The census of the Philippine Islands is to be taken by that government during the year 1919.

This bill provides for the appointment of 400 supervisors to oversee and direct the work of the enumerators. It also provides for an increase in the office force of the bureau to a maximum of perhaps 4,500 employees. It further provides for an adequate number of supervisory officials, statisticians, and statistical experts to insure the efficient management and organization of the work and the presentation of the data in a convenient and usable form with such critical analysis as may be necessary to bring out the true significance of the figures. In view of the greatly increased cost of living and the consequently higher standard of compensation, the bill provides for some increases in the salaries, but not more than is necessary in order to secure and retain properly qualified men for these positions.

In the penalty sections there are some changes made in the previous act for the Thirteenth Census with regard to the refusal to give information and giving false information and to strengthen the authority of the bureau so as to insure complete and accurate returns and to prevent frauds, padding of the population, and the withholding of information. In general, however, the bill is not radical. It follows the lines of the legislation for prior censuses. The changes relate to details and are based upon the experience of previous censuses.

One change of some importance, probably the most notable, is that affecting the date of the census. This bill provides for the Fourteenth Census as of date of January 1, 1920. Prior to 1910 the census was taken in June; the data relating to conditions on June 1. Because of the summer exodus from the cities at that time it did not prove to be a good time for the enumeration of population and accordingly, at the census of 1910 the date was changed to April 15. That date proved satisfactory as regards the census of population but was not found suitable for a census of agriculture because so many of the farms are at that season occupied by tenants or owners who have recently taken possession and who are therefore not well informed regarding the crops of the preceding season. Furthermore, as it is the season of the year when farm animals are born it is not well adapted for the enumeration of live stock. The census of agriculture, however, can not very well be separated in point of time from that of population, because the enumerators in the rural districts fill out the schedules covering both subjects in the same canvas. If the census of agriculture were taken at this time it would necessitate canvassing rural districts twice, a procedure which would obviously involve an unjustifiable increase in the cost of the census. The date of January 1 was decided upon at a general conference held in this city last August by representatives of the Bureau of the Census, the Department of Agriculture, and a number of agricultural students, experts, and editors. This conference prepared a tentative schedule for agriculture for the census of 1920. For further information about change of date see discussion of section 20, page 28, of the hearings before the Committee on the Census, February 20, 1918, entitled "Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses."

Probably the second change of greatest importance is increasing the number of supervisors from 330 to 400 and the method to be used for the appointment of the supervisors. Formerly the supervisors of the census were appointed by the President of the United States with the advice and consent of the Senate. This bill provides that the supervisors shall be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce upon the recommendation of the Director of the Census. For the reasons for this change, see section 9, pages 20–21 of the hearings before the Committee on the Census, February 20, 1918, entitled, "Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses."

The third main point of interest in the bill is the enumeration of topics or inquiries which are to be included in the census schedules. For further information see section 8, pages 15–20, of the hearings before the Committee on the Census, February 20, 1918, entitled, "Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censusses."

The fourth point of interest in the bill is the provision covering the number of officials to be appointed and the compensation allowed them. For further information on this point see section 3, page 9, and section 5, page 12, of the hearings before the Committee on the Census, entitled, "Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses."

The principal points of difference between this bill and the Thirteenth Census act are as follows:

Section 3: Addition of 20 statistical experts and two stenographers to the official staff of the bureau.

Section 5: Increase in salaries of certain officials.

Section 6: Reclassification of clerical force so as to provide a greater number of classes and thus make possible more frequent promotions and a somewhat higher average rate of compensation, raising the limit upon number of higher salaried clerks.

Section 7: Change in method of making certifications by Civil Service Commission so as to relieve Census Bureau of certain detail work properly belonging to Civil Service Commission; insertion of proviso that requirement as to conformity with law of apportionment shall not apply to messenger boys, unskilled laborers, and charwomen; change of limit as to length of temporary employment of certain classes of employees from 60 days to 6 months.

Section 8, first paragraph: Omission of inquiries in regard to unemployment and in regard to survivors of Union or Confederate Army or Navy; omission of specification of inquiries to be made in connection with enumeration of institutions (the intention being to postpone this piece of work until after the termination of the census period).

Section 8, second paragraph: Addition of inquiry as to sex of farm operators; omission of inquiries as to character of timber on farms, as to value of live stock and farm products, and as to acreage of crops planted and to be planted during the year of enumeration—the purpose being to make the enumeration as of January 1—addition of inquiries in regard to irrigation and drainage enterprises.

Section 8, third paragraph: Omission of inquiry as to stockholders in manufacturing enterprises.

Section 8, fifth paragraph: Omission of specific provision for inquiry as to turpentine and rosin (such provision being unnecessary, since the bureau already has sufficient authority to make the inquiry).

Section 9: Change in method of appointing supervisors of census; increase in number of supervisors from 330 to 400.

Section 12: Change of census date from April 15 to January 1 (also provided for by section 20); substitution of "living nearest to such place of abode who may be competent to answer such inquiries" for "living in the neighborhood of such place of abode," in specification as to families or persons from whom enumerator may obtain information in absence of families or persons to be enumerated (purpose of change being to make fraud more difficult).

Section 15: Specification of duties of interpreters (purpose being to discourage fraud).

Section 16: Insertion of provision for compensation of enumerators canvassing irrigation or drainage enterprises.

Section 18: Insertion of specification of duties of special agents (purpose being to discourage fraud); provision for not to exceed 25 special agents, of known and tried experience in statistical work, at compensation not to exceed $10 per diem; removal of limitation as to maximum amount earned per diem by special agents on piece-price basis; increase of allowance in lieu of subsistence from $3 to $4 per diem.

Section 20: Change of census date from April 15 to January 1 (also provided for by section 12); change of minimum size limit for cities in which enumeration shall be completed within two weeks from 5,000 to 2,500 inhabitants.

Sections 21 and 22: Substitution of "felony" for "misdemeanor" in cases of offenses for which penalties provided include possible imprisonment for more than one year in order to bring provisions of sections into harmony with section 355 of Criminal Code.

Section 23: Insertion of provision (entire second paragraph) for purpose of discouraging "boosting" practices which have prevailed in certain cities during decennial enumerations.

Section 24: Revision so as to impose upon all persons or organizations (instead of only those engaged in productive industry) the duty of supplying information which Census Bureau is authorized by law to obtain.

Section 27: Increase of allowance in lieu of subsistence for "officers and employees" (not including special agents) from $4 to $5 per diem and omission of provision for allowance to cover actual subsistence expenses, not exceeding $5 per diem.

Section 29: Insertion of provision for removal of weight limit on census mail matter.

Section 31: Renewal of provision for mid-decennial census of agriculture to be taken as of January 1 instead of October 1. (Similar provision in Thirteenth Census act was repealed by appropriation act for 1916.)

Section 32 (new section): Provision for biennial census of products of manufacturing industries.

Section 33 (formerly 32): Extension of authority given Census Bureau to furnish transcripts of records and to prepare special statistical compilations for State and local officials and for private individuals; revision of provision in regard to disposal of amounts received in payment for work of this character, so as to make such amounts actually serviceable to the Census Bureau instead of only nominally so; insertion of provision that information furnished shall not be used to detriment of person or persons to whom it relates.

CONCISE STATEMENT OF NEEDS.

The principal needs of the Bureau of the Census at this time may be classified as follows:

(a) Permanent recognition by Congress that the Bureau of the Census is the one statistical service of the National Government, created by the Congress for this sole purpose, to which should be assigned all inquiries for statistical facts required by this national body, as well as statistical work which is now being done in many different ways and more or less inaccurately by boards, commissions, and a few other bureaus of departments of the regular service. We should remember that we created this service to do our statistical work and that we have made our annual appropriations to enable this office to thoroughly equip itself with statistically trained employees and all other resources and machinery for prompt, efficient, and accurate statistical work. It has gotten to be a habit in the Government service for almost every new board, commission, or bureau to establish its own statistical division as soon as organized. Because of this decentralization of the statistical work of our National Government no one of us to-day knows just where to secure the data we need. This evil has been growing for a number of years. The time has come for the National Congress to place itself on record in this matter. We should say to all branches of the national service in this city that the statistical work of our Government must be done by the statistical bureau we created to do this class of work.

(b) The second need is a bureau need at this time. This need is for a reclassification and revision of its salary scale so as to place this bureau on an equal footing in this respect with other Federal establishments. The great difficulty experienced by the bureau at this time is the serious handicap arising from the constant loss of its best-trained experts and officials occasioned by the fact that the bureau has at its disposal only a very small number of higher salaried positions. The present salaries are altogether too low to attract and retain the kind of persons from whom the bureau can recruit and build up its staff of minor officials and subofficials. In fact, it is difficult enough even to obtain satisfactory clerical help and practically impossible to secure efficient stenographers and typewriters at this time in increasing its force. The present well-trained force of the bureau comprise about 600 employees. In the course of the decennial census period this force will have to be increased to a maximum of possibly 4,500. Yet the highest salary which the bureau has at its disposal at this time, next to that of the director, is only $3,000 per annum, and there are but five positions of that grade. The salary scale then drops to $2,000 per annum, and there are only 10 positions carrying that salary. Such salaries, especially in these times, are entirely inadequate to secure and retain the class of assistance such as statisticians, trained experts, and supervisory officials which the Director must have associated with him if he is to be in a position to take a prompt and accurate census and present results adequately analyzed in the most practical and usable form. The bill now before the House provides for some increases in salaries over those paid the permanent force. These increases are reasonable.

(c) The third need of the bureau is provision for the employment of a large number of statistical experts, some of whom should be qualified as text-writers. The salaries to be paid these statistical experts should be sufficient to attract capable men—men who are willing to give their time and best services to the work of the bureau. This provision in the present bill makes possible the employment of a number of these experts for the Fourteenth Decennial Census. Not only should the bureau have a provision for the employment of capable statistical experts and text-writers during a decennial census, but this provision should also apply for the years between the decennial census periods.

On account of war conditions and the difficulty of securing machines and supplies, early provision and appropriations should be made to secure these essential things in time in order to save delay and congestion in the great work of our next census. No one in the administration, much less the director and the officials of this bureau, desires to be hampered and delayed in the greatest single piece of civil work done by the National Government. This bill, if passed by this Congress as reported by the Census Committee, will give the director the authority to proceed with his plans for the organization, both in the office and in the field, to handle promptly, efficiently, and economically the census of 1920.

The evils which have existed in former decennial censuses may be classed under four heads: (a) Delay in publishing results; (b) presentation of results in such manner as to make it difficult for the lay reader to find what he wants; (c) inaccuracy; (d) failure to supply information desired by some users of census statistics.

While the evils just mentioned are primarily those of a decennial census, still there is a greater and more extensive evil existing at this time and under present war conditions, which affects more seriously the bureau's legal functions and every-day actual service than those even of a decennial-census period. This latter evil is the use of the bureau's trained statistical experts and thorough equipment along all lines of statistical work by other services of the Government, notably new commissions, in work of their own, for which no proportionate credit is given to the Bureau of the Census. This present evil leads to duplication in Government work and unnecessary expenditure of time and funds—an evil which might be called "farming out" of the statistically trained force and equipment of the Bureau of the Census.

I have mentioned delay in publishing results as the first evil of former decennial censuses. The Bureau of the Census has been criticized for delay in issuing its statistics. It must be admitted that there was a lamentable failure to get out the reports for the census of 1910 within the three-year period required by law. Criticisms have appeared more recently in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as regards the manufactures census of 1914. It is but fair to the bureau to say that such criticisms are not infrequently based on a misunderstanding of the actual situation. It is the custom of the bureau, after completing any investigation, to issue bulletins at the earliest possible moment giving the main results or basic figures to the public. Then, at a later date, carefully prepared reports are published containing text, percentages, and ratios, and perhaps presenting the figures in somewhat greater detail. Persons receiving these reports do not always realize that they are not the first publication of the data or that the figures have already been given to the public. These reports, however, have a permanent value. They are constantly studied and consulted and are quoted by educators, journalists, and legislators. Not a day passes in which the Bureau of the Census does not receive numerous requests from Members of Congress asking for statistical data either for themselves or for their constituents. Other requests come in from all parts of the country and from all classes of people. The census publications are distributed to all the principal libraries of the United States and are constantly consulted by students and writers. If these permanent reports of the bureau were discontinued, the loss to the country would be irreparable. In making this statement, however, I do not wish to be understood as justifying delay on the part of the Census Bureau in publishing its statistics; nor do I claim that there are not good grounds and justification for the criticisms to which the bureau has been subjected in the past because of the excessive delays. I am in a position to say, however, that the present management of the bureau is fully aware of the importance of prompt and up-to-date publication of the data and is fully resolved to correct conditions which have given rise to the criticism in connection with the previous censuses. To place the bureau in a position to accomplish that is the purpose of the bill now before the House.

The bureau is planning to lessen the number of inquiries carried on its schedules and to curtail text discussions of the tables. Much of the text appearing in the final reports of preceding censuses is valueless, or nearly so, consisting merely of a more or less aimless sort of rehash of the figures presented in the tables. The average user of census or other statistics never reads any of the text unless he is seeking an explanation of something in the tables which is not clear to him. It is much easier to obtain any item of information from a statistical table than to extract the same item of information from a more or less heterogeneous mass of statistical material in text form. Not only will a material saving of time be accomplished by cutting out all useless text writing, but an actual improvement in the census reports will be effected thereby. The only two functions properly to be discharged by text in census reports are, first, the making of all needed explanations in regard to the scope of the census, the meaning of the terms employed, and so forth; and, second, the pointing out of any specially important facts contained in a statistical table in cases where the importance of these facts is not reasonably obvious from an examination of the table itself. Of these two functions the first is by far the most essential.

The presentation of the results in such manner as to make it difficult for the lay reader to find what he wants: The bureau also plans to publish its results in such form as will make them readily accessible to all users. Each complete report will carry a detailed alphabetical index, and all bulletins a comprehensive table of contents. In this way persons seeking information will be able to find quickly and accurately just the facts desired.

Inaccuracies: Means have been adopted by which inaccuracies in census figures, which are not now very serious in most cases, will be eliminated to a great extent.

Failure to supply information desired by some users of census statistics can not be helped, because of the detail of the statistics requested. The necessity of curtailing the detail in which statistics are presented for a decennial census in order to complete the work within the three-year period required by law will even under new methods prevent the bureau from occasionally supplying some facts, but the method to be adopted will place such instances at a minimum. It is well to remember in this connection the expansion of the census work as shown between the census of 1790 and that of 1910. In 1790 all of the statistics of the census were presented in a small volume of 56 pages. The statistics of the census of 1910 were presented in 12 large volumes, including the abstract, of 11,456 pages.

The principal evil affecting the Bureau of the Census to-day is the growth of a number of statistical sections and divisions in nearly every board and commission recently created. Congress created the Bureau of the Census to be the statistical service of the National Government. It is not only the largest statistical office of the United States but the largest in the world. It is equipped with a well-trained statistical force of more than 600 employees, a number of whom rank very highly as expert statisticians. Its field of investigation is very broad, covering the entire United States, and even reaching to our outlying possessions. Its reports to-day are accepted officially the world over as being the most thorough, accurate, and complete statistics presented by the United States Government.

With this bureau created by Congress as the statistical service of the National Government, it is not only logical but right that all statistical inquiries ordered by Congress or directed by other services of the Government should be assigned to it. By doing this, duplication of work and additional employees, as well as the expenditure of valuable time and money, could be avoided. The Bureau of the Census, as intended by its creators, should be the clearing house for all the statistical information collected by the Government. This work should be centralized in this bureau, which is so well equipped to do it efficiently, economically, and with the least expenditure of the people's money. The Bureau of the Census does not make estimates but an actual enumeration of definite facts. A number of the bureaus of the Government service now doing statistical work—and this is especially true of a number of our war boards and commissions—secure only sufficient data as a basis on which to make estimates and the resulting figures vary greatly in many cases from the actual facts. I am not making this statement in any sense of severe criticism, for probably the services mentioned have done the very best they possibly could in this time of national stress; but the Census Bureau is so thoroughly equipped for statistical work and its large force so well trained in both field and office inquiries of large moment that merely as a matter of business as well as of securing reliable, accurate, and valuable data, it is desirable for Congress to see that the statistical work of the Government is assigned to this bureau.

As a matter of fact, practically all of the war bureaus, as well as many of the bureaus of the Government services now attempting to do statistical work, have to come to the Bureau of the Census to secure their data as a basis on which to found their work. These other services not only make use of the statistical data already collected and compiled by this office, but practically all of them come to the bureau to learn their methods of collecting and compiling statistics. At a recent hearing on this bill, under date of February 20, 1918, the chairman of the committee asked the Director of the Census if his organization was not equipped and especially qualified to do any piece of war work on its own initiative. The director replied:

> Yes, sir; and more than that. We are volunteers to do war work. We want to do our bit, if it takes night and day. * * * There are so many times now when the Census Bureau is called upon to do what I consider lending itself out. They will want a statistical piece of work done under the supervision of some particular man who has gotten an appointment and in order to cooperate with them, we will send a number of our trained people, trained in gathering statistics, tabulating statistics, and making deductions, to do what we call war work under somebody who has not been engaged in that kind of business.

The director further stated that the Bureau of the Census has already been doing pieces of statistical work for other services; in fact, that during the last year this class of work amounted to the services of one man for 15 years. He said that, so far as he knew, no credit had been given the Bureau for the service rendered. He said:

> I think that it is highly improper to call upon the Bureau of the Census to disintegrate itself and be used to do the work that it is trained to do and organized to do and called upon to do.

When asked by myself—

> What is necessary to be done by the Congress to correct that evil which is manifest and has been admitted for several years?

The director gave his opinion, as follows:

> I think the statistical work ought to be placed upon the Bureau of the Census.

For further discussion see pages 38 to 41 of the hearings before the Committee on the Census, February 20, 1918, entitled "Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses."

Scope of the census: This bill provides that a census of population, agriculture, manufactures, and mines and quarries of the United States shall be taken by the Director of the Census in the year 1920. Section 8 enumerates the topics or inquiries which are to be included in the census schedules. The first paragraph of section 8, as defining the general scope of the census, specifies the inquiries to be included on the population schedule. The second paragraph of the section specifies the inquiries to be included in the agricultural schedule. The general agricultural inquiries will have to be answered by the more than 7,000,000 farmers in the United States. There will also be a schedule for "Live stock not on farms and ranges." Attention is also called to the schedules or special census of irrigation and drainage enterprises.

It seems to me that one of the great problems after the war will be the locating of the thousands of returning soldiers in homes. At the close of the Civil War a great movement took place in opening up and developing the West. Thousands and thousands of soldiers returning to their homes found no places of employment awaiting them and no means by which to secure a livelihood. This condition started the great movement toward the West. Out of this soldier movement has come a great and prosperous section of our country. Now, more than half a century later, comes the problem of returning soldiers and what to do with them. We must increase the number of homes and food production in this country. Besides feeding our own people, there will be a few years following the end of this titanic struggle in which our people must feed practically the whole of Europe. In fact it is probable that this great and prosperous country must, to a great extent, feed the civilized world. Irrigation is opening up lands in the West that can be made into farms and homes. Draining the great swamps and alluvial sections of the East and South will open up thousands and thousands of fertile acres of land for homes and farms. The data for what we have and what can be done will be supplied by this census. The census, after all, is an inventory of the Nation's resources; it is our national stock taking in decennial periods.

The third paragraph of section 8 discusses the inquiries on the manufactures schedule. This census will be an important one. It is very vital that we secure at this time a complete census of our manufacturing industries. We shall have a world trade, which means a world competition, and we must know what we are able to do to meet the conditions that will then face us. We must supply the world. All of the materials which go into the great industrial life of a civilized world must come to a greater or less extent from our mills. Not alone in our field of manufacturing but also in the field of mines and quarries this census will give us definite facts—an actual stock taking of our national resources in all industrial lines—as the permanent basis upon which to build and carry forward our campaign for the trade of the civilized world. In every harbor of the world will be seen vessels carrying the products of our farms and factories and flying aloft the Stars and Stripes. The times are rapidly changing. The older order has gone. The dawn of the new era is already breaking over the world. After the smoke of battle clears away and autocracy has passed forever, will come the new day of industrial freedom and the rule of permanent peace—the rule of justice and right and the brotherhood of man—throughout a new world in which democracy is triumphant.

> * * * through the ages one increasing purpose runs,
> And the thoughts of men are widen'd with the process of the suns.

It is then that the United States will come into its own as the dominant power—financially, industrially, intellectually, and morally—of the civilized world.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. NICHOLS] use some of his time?

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, we have been advised by the administration many times that we ought to confine our legislation as far as possible to what concerns the war, and that both the money and effort of the American people should be devoted exclusively to war purposes. And I think we all acquiesce——

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield there for a moment?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. ASWELL. Does not the gentleman recognize that, of all questions, the getting of information and organizing our resources is a war question?

Mr. GILLETT. I will come to that. I say that it is recommended to us that we ought to confine the money that we appropriate and the efforts of the people to war purposes, and the gentleman, of course, acquiesces in that. Therefore we do not want to appropriate in this bill anything that is not helpful for the war, except so far as it is incumbent upon us to follow out the mandate of the Constitution. As far as the enumeration of the population goes, if it were not for the Constitution, I should be in favor of not taking any census at present, because I think that to take a census in 1920, which will be right in the heat of this war, when millions of our population will not be in this country but in Europe, when thousands, and I do not know but millions——

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield just there?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. The part of our population that is in Europe will be taken in the census.

Mr. GILLETT. Are you going to take a census of them?

Mr. ASWELL. Why not?

Mr. GILLETT. How will you find out? Does the bill provide for it?

Mr. ASWELL. We have that census already on record in the War Department.

Mr. GILLETT. But they could not be reckoned in this census. The enumerators could not find them. When they come back you do not know where they will be. When the boys who are in Europe come back, probably thousands and hundreds of thousands will not settle down in the places from which they came. They will not be any longer citizens of their former neighborhoods. So the statistics of population will be unreliable and useless. And, moreover, to-day thousands and hundreds of thousands, I expect, of our population have been diverted from their natural residences. They have been diverted to the seashore, where ships are building; to the great munition factories; and to various other communities. So that the whole country over is to-day in an abnormal condition, and the statistics which we gather will not reflect at all the normal condition of the country. And therefore, for the purposes for which a census is really taken, they are largely valueless. But I admit that the Constitution imposes on us the duty of taking the enumeration every 10 years, and that therefore we are obliged to take it. We ought to take it just as late as we can under the law, which would be the end of 1920, because this war may end within a year, and we ought to limit it as much as possible and await developments.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield just there?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. Does not the gentleman recognize the importance of taking the census before the war ends, so that we will have a record of peace times and war times? How else can we get a record of the country's resources during the war?

Mr. GILLETT. I was talking about the population and not about resources. I do not agree with the gentleman as to that. I think a census is valueless, largely, as to our resources in war times, except for war purposes, and we shall get its results too late for that, and it is not at all useful for what a census is taken for, namely, for the development of our country in times of peace.

But, as I was saying when the gentleman interrupted, we are obliged by the Constitution to take an enumeration, and so I recognize we must do that.

But not only is our population disorganized and abnormal at the present time, but the same is true with respect to our industries. They are all abnormal. They are not developing along the ordinary lines and under the ordinary conditions and in the ordinary places, and therefore a census of them and statistics about them will simply gratify curiosity and show what we did in the war; but for peace purposes they will be largely useless.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. So that my contention is that we ought to take just as little as possible to comply with the obligations of the Constitution. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HELM. The war broke in Europe on August 2, 1914, I believe. Almost immediately following that date there was a stimulation of business activity in the United States. Prior to the time that Congress declared war there was a very noticeable speeding up in activity in munition making and along other lines. The war period from 1914 to 1920 covers six years of the decennial period. Does the gentleman think that a census of a period that had been consumed almost entirely in war activities would not be worth while from a business standpoint, and more especially from a historical viewpoint?

Mr. GILLETT. I certainly do. That is just my argument. I think it would be useless from a business standpoint. We are all fighting this war to make it the last war, so that there shall be no more wars for us. We do not care, for our future development, what the war statistics are. I will agree that there will be a certain historical interest in it; but we are not taking a census for historical interest. For that purpose plenty will be known without this census. Moreover, we took a census of manufactures in 1916. We have been taking statistics enough to gratify most practical purposes in the last few years. We took a census of manufactures in 1916, as I say. We have authorized the Ship Corporation to make an investigation of our forests. The Bureau of Labor has been authorized to make an investigation of our labor statistics, which has been appropriated for. We have had a census of fuel and a census of food and a census of cotton and of mines and mining, so that there has been quite enough, in my opinion, to gratify our historical interest; and I believe there has been enough to meet our business requirements, so that it seems to me the clear duty of Congress now, under its general obligation to limit our expenses and limit the effort of the people to war purposes—the clear obligation on us in this bill is to do just as little as we can and comply with the Constitution, so that if I had my way in this bill I should have made it simply an enumeration of population.

But the main criticism which I make of this bill, and the only point to which I will direct my attention, is this provision of not having the supervisors appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, as has always been done in the past, but to have them appointed by the Director of the Census and the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Before the gentleman proceeds further in the discussion of this proposition, is it the intention of the Census Bureau that the work of the census should overlap the work of the various departments that the gentleman from Massachusetts has mentioned?

Mr. GILLETT. Why, of course it is going to repeat what they have done.

Mr. LONDON. That would be a waste both of time and energy and money.

Mr. GILLETT. That is what I think.

Mr. LONDON. I understood that the Bureau of the Census would necessarily take the data accumulated by others and assemble those data for the purposes of the census.

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, I do not think so. I think they would start in and make an original investigation in every line.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Has the gentleman read the statements of Mr. Smith, the Director of the Geological Survey, and Mr. Manning, the Director of the Bureau of Mines, to determine whether or not there would be a duplication of work?

Mr. GILLETT. No; I have not.

Mr. ALEXANDER. They do not think they will duplicate. They think this census will develop facts that they did not get.

Mr. GILLETT. Of course, it will develop more than they got.

Mr. ALEXANDER. They say it is necessary to take a census of mines and collieries for the very reason that this is the only way in which you can get definite, accurate information as the basis for the intervening decennial period.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. I just want to state that the various bureaus of the Government have all appointed committees and have had session after session, working out the plans for the future by which there will be no duplication.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LONDON. It seems to me that the work of the Census Bureau will be entirely wasted except for the purpose contemplated in the Constitution unless it continues the work heretofore conducted and makes its new investigation the basis of further and continuous studies. In other words, the work of the census must be of the nature of the statistical bureau of the Nation in order that it should be useful and of permanent value.

Mr. GILLETT. I agree with the gentleman as to that. Of course, the different heads of the bureaus are in favor of it. Did you ever hear of a bureau head that was not in favor of developing just as far as possible the subjects with which his bureau dealt? I do not say that in any criticism of them, because we want them to be enthusiastic and appreciate and exaggerate the importance of their bureaus. Of course, they will say that they will try to arrange to prevent duplication, but it inevitably will involve duplication, and it is simply going a great deal further than in my opinion we are called upon to go in this time of stress.

Now, to return, as I say, to the one thing in this bill which seems to me to deserve the criticism not only of our side, but of that side of the House; it is the taking away from the President the appointment of the supervisors, because I am frank to say—and I am not accusing any particular gentleman or any particular committee—that I believe the purpose of that provision is mainly to give political patronage to this head of the Census Bureau.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. In what way would it be more successful, if your criticism is true, for the director to make the appointments than for the President to make the appointments—the leader of the party?

Mr. GILLETT. For this reason: The President makes it and sends it to the Senate, where it can be discussed, where it is a matter of importance and attracts attention. Members on both sides can criticize the appointees, and, if there are objections to them they can bring them forward. But when it is done by the Director of the Census, he can appoint any petty local politician, and in his district and neighborhood it is known about, but it is not known about generally where it can be discussed and where the impropriety of it can be shown.

Mr. ASWELL. Can the gentleman recall 10 years ago that any petty politicians were appointed under that provision?

Mr. GILLETT. There was no such provision 10 years ago.

Mr. ASWELL. I mean when the President appointed them; were there any petty politicians appointed under the Republican administration?

Mr. GILLETT. There may have been, but I will venture to say that there were not anything like the number that would have been appointed if the Director of the Census had appointed them then or that will be appointed now if the Director of the Census appoints them. I think the gentleman in fairness will admit that the notoriety of having the names sent down by the President, the responsibility of the President in being obliged to send the names to the Senate and having them confirmed will, of itself, secure a higher class of men, and I will trust the President of the United States to be much less disposed to play petty politics than I will the Director of the Census, particularly when he has to do it in the light of day and send them to the Senate for confirmation.

Mr. ASWELL. I trust the President implicitly; but is it not a fact that the President necessarily will have to get his information from the same sources?

Mr. GILLETT. He will not get it necessarily from the Director of the Census. He will get it from the locality.

Mr. ASWELL. He will get his information from the same sources as the Director of the Census will get his.

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; but he will not have the same temptations that the Director of the Census will have. He will be conspicuous and careful. The Director of the Census will be perfectly free to yield to any local politician, and the President will not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GILLETT. My time has been so absorbed by interruptions that I have not really got started. I will ask the gentleman for 10 minutes more.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. What argument has been advanced in support of the change of the policy of appointment?

Mr. GILLETT. I am coming to that. I want to say a word, however, as to the argument made by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] that 10 years ago politics was attempted. I remember that discussion very well. I have no doubt that politics has been attempted at every census, by Republicans as well as by Democrats; but 10 years ago, when President Roosevelt vetoed the bill, it was not simply because of an attempt to give Republicans an advantage; it was because of an attempt on both sides of the House, that Democratic Congressmen as well as Republican Congressmen should have the patronage; and he vetoed it because he thought the appointments should not be a matter of patronage, either personal or political.

Now I will give the gentleman from Wyoming the reason which is given for this proposed change. The only reason I have heard advanced, the only reason I have seen stated in these hearings and in the report, is that the census begins on January 1 instead of April 1, 1920, and that there may not be a session of the Senate to confirm the appointments before that time. Of course that is a pitiful excuse. We know that the Senate, in all probability, will be in session, and that Congress will be in session all through next summer, off and on, as it will this summer. There will be plenty of opportunity to confirm the appointees. They can be confirmed even at the session which always follows the 4th of March. They always have an extra session of the Senate at that time, and the chances are a hundred to one that the Senate will be in session next summer. But why was January 1 selected? I suspect that it was selected just for the very purpose of giving a basis of an excuse for not having the President appoint the supervisors. Now, the Director of the Census is a politician. This administration has not appointed to that office statisticians but politicians. The Director of the Census who was first appointed by this administration was Mr. Harris, from Georgia, who, if I recollect aright, was the chairman of the Democratic committee of that State, and I know he gave up much of his time, which ought to have been spent here in the Census Bureau, to the pursuit of politics in his own State. I am told that the present Director of the Census was the campaign manager of Senator SIMMONS, of North Carolina.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; if you will give me a little time.

Mr. ASWELL. I should like to call attention to this fact, if the gentleman will permit me, that the committee that selected January 1 as the most desirable date are a majority of them members of the Republican Party.

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, well, they are under the control of Mr. ROGERS. They are his subordinates.

Mr. LARSEN. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. GILLETT. If the gentleman will give me five minutes, I will.

Mr. LARSEN. I have no time myself.

Mr. GILLETT. Then I can not yield. My time is too limited. Now, the reason put forward by the committee is this:

> The change of date to January 1 was made to meet the requirements of the agricultural census, which, because of the house-to-house canvass must be taken in connection with the enumeration of population. The 15th of April, the date of the previous census, is not a good time of year in which to take a census of crops and live stock.

That is in the report of the hearings of the committee, on page 28; but I notice, on page 247 of the same hearings, when the representative of the Agricultural Department comes up he says:

> I should like to suggest to the committee, before it is finally decided that a live-stock census be taken as of January 1, that the opinion be taken of the live-stock experts of the Bureau of Animal Industry and other interested parties, because it seems to me, and to some of the men in the Bureau of Animal Industry with whom I have talked about the matter, that January 1 is pretty nearly the worst possible date on which to take a live-stock census.

So at any rate there are obviously two opinions, and without discussing that subject I can not help entertaining the suspicion that this is a mere pretext to give a reason for having these supervisors appointed by the Director of the Census.

Mr. ASWELL. Does the gentleman recall that in 1910, when his party had control of this matter, the date was changed from June to April?

Mr. GILLETT. April may be better than June. I am willing to concede that.

Mr. ASWELL. By the same process of reasoning it covers the gentleman's point.

Mr. GILLETT. It does not cover the reason. There is an obvious reason for changing it from the middle of the summer, which does not apply to changing it from the 1st of April to the 1st of January. Now, if the present Director of the Census, a Democratic politician, is to have the appointment of supervisors he can and, in my opinion will, appoint supervisors for political purposes. The committee has raised the number of supervisors from 330 to 400. Ten years ago the number was raised from 300 to 330, 10 per cent. Now it is raised from 330 to 400, and that is twice the percentage and more than twice the number of the previous increase. Why is that done? To give more patronage. The country has of course increased in numbers, it has largely been in the great industrial centers where they do not require any more supervisors. The great State of Massachusetts has but one supervisor—one for 4,000,000 people. In parts of the country where the growth has come you do not have any more, but you bring in 70 more so that you can have 70 politicians working before the presidential election for the Democratic Party. That in my opinion is the vice in this bill. I think the number of supervisors should be reduced, and I think the appointment of supervisors should be taken away from the Director of the Census and left where it has been before, and let them be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. We will have a better character of supervisors, and at any rate we who will have no voice in the appointments will have more confidence that they will not be used mainly for machine political purposes but for the purposes for which they are appointed. The supervisor has a pretty good job—$1,500 and some perquisites besides. He has a large horde of enumerators under his control, and it is unfortunate that this census is to come just before a national election, which, of course, adds more to the possibilities that he can accomplish in a political way, and adds more to our unwillingness to have these political purposes carried out.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman says the 1st of January was selected as the time so that there would be a reason why the supervisors should be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce rather than the President.

Mr. GILLETT. I could see no other good reason.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If it was for political purposes, why not take it in April so the supervisors and enumerators would all be in one political campaign? Why make it the 1st of January, when the enumerators will all be out of office, because they will be through by the last of February?

Mr. GILLETT. That is in the year before the presidential election. It strikes me that the enumerators will be thinking of politics in February before election.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. I will.

Mr. ASWELL. Would not April be a better time?

Mr. GILLETT. That is the only reason that I can see. In the first part of the report you say that it is better for agricultural purposes to take it the 1st of January, and at the end the agricultural expert says that January is a much worse time than April. Now, I may have done an injustice in suggesting that that was the reason for selecting January 1. It only seemed to me that that was the reason, because it was used as an excuse for taking the appointments away from the President and giving them to the Director of the Census. At any rate, I believe that the increase of supervisors was made in order to have more Democratic patronage and that the appointments are taken away from the President and given to the Director of the Census for the same reason.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman has had a long, useful, and very distinguished service in the Congress of the United States. He has served under a Republican administration and under a Democratic administration. In the course of his service he has doubtless observed that these appointments that are to be approved by the Senate, especially in post-office matters, frequently culminate in interminable wrangles and disputes concerning the appointments. One Senator wants one man for postmaster and another Senator wants another. Members of Congress want one man and another Member another. This census work is a type and character of work that must begin and move as a solid column. If you break the line in Massachusetts by wrangling over the appointment of supervisor, that work fails and falls back by reason of the squabble that arises in the Senate over the appointment of the supervisor. If the line is broken anywhere in any State of the Union or in any district in the Union, that work falls back. Inevitably as night follows day innumerable squabbles arise over the confirmation of supervisors and without limitation as to time of settlement. That was one of the reasons for this change.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield me two minutes more?

Mr. HELM. I will.

Mr. GILLETT. I recognize that that is a fair argument and that there might be, as there often is, trouble and delay over confirmations, but at the same time that plan has always been followed and it has not prevented supervisors being duly appointed.

Mr. HELM. I want them to get over the habit.

Mr. GILLETT. You are getting into a worse habit because you are going to subordinate it to politicians. Ten years ago in a Republican House I opposed making spoils out of the appointments. I opposed in debate and by vote the provision on account of which the bill was vetoed finally by President Roosevelt. I try to be consistent, and I would oppose it in a Republican House as much as I do in a Democratic House, and therefore I think I have more right to point out the viciousness of this proposition. [Applause.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], who is one of the distinguished Members of this House, takes such a narrow partisan view of this legislation. I believe that every member of the committee excepting the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY], and evidently his liver is out of order, will agree that politics did not influence the committee at all in the preparation of this bill.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Did I understand the gentleman to say that politics had no consideration in the bill?

Mr. ALEXANDER. As far as the committee was concerned—it had no influence on me.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. I can not speak for the whole committee, but I believe the necessities of the proposed legislation were recognized by most members of the committee, but they also understood and recognized the inevitableness of the political situation.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is inevitable, if you refer to the fact that the census will be taken in 1920 and we will have a political campaign on at that time. That can not possibly be avoided. The fourteenth decennial period covers 1920. In providing for the taking of a census of the population we are obeying a constitutional mandate. But that this legislation is being framed now with the view to promoting the interests of a political party, to my mind is absurd, and we may well question the sincerity or good faith of any gentleman on that side of the House who says so. This bill is to all intents and purposes the reenactment of the census act of 1909. It is a reenactment of that legislation, only modified to make it applicable to meet changed conditions and provide the necessary machinery to take the Fourteenth Decennial Census. I want the committee to understand that fact.

As regards the appointment of supervisors of the census, I do not care a fig whether they are appointed by the Secretary of Commerce on the recommendation of the Director of the Census or by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The committee appointed by the Director of the Census to consider the necessary legislation under which the Fourteenth Decennial Census should be taken recommended that the appointment should be made by the Secretary of Commerce on the recommendation of the Director of the Census, to overcome an administrative difficulty, and for no other reason. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY], who was connected with the Census Bureau when the Twelfth Census was taken, I am sure, if he were present, would confirm what I am going to say, that if we provide that the appointments be by the President, to be confirmed by the Senate, unless the Senate is in session when the appointments are made, so that they can be confirmed promptly, the appointments will be postponed until December, 1919, and in that way the organization of the Census Bureau will necessarily be delayed, and the very difficulty will be met that confronted the bureau in taking the census in 1909. If the Senate is in session in July, 1919, or when these appointments are made, and it would not involve delay, so far as I am concerned, it is a matter of indifference whether the appointment of supervisors is made in the manner provided in the bill or by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and that was the viewpoint of the committee. But we considered the report made by the committee on legislation for the Fourteenth Decennial Census and the reasons they assigned why the supervisors should be appointed in the manner provided in the bill and thought they were reasonable and sound, and we conformed our action to their view. That they were influenced in their recommendations by any political considerations is absurd. The majority of that committee, I understand, are Republicans. They have been in the Census Bureau for years, and they have not only participated in taking one census, but some have participated in taking two, and possibly more, censuses. I am not willing to believe that they were prompted by any motive of that sort.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. They were all subordinates of the man they suggested should make the appointments.

Mr. ALEXANDER. They are under the civil service; they are independent of the Director of the Census; they are not in any way subservient to him. I am unwilling to believe they were coerced or influenced by the director against their better judgment.

That committee was appointed July 10, 1917, and they reported to the Director of the Census December 22, 1917. As I have said, the members of that committee are long-time employees of the Bureau of the Census, men of large experience in census work, experts in their lines, and worthy of our respect and confidence. Some, if not all, are chiefs of divisions. Dr. John Lee Coulter, formerly chief special agent of the Bureau of the Census in the Division of Agriculture, and now dean of the agricultural department of the University of West Virginia, was invited by the chairman of that committee to take part in the discussions of the committee when he was in the city. He gave the committee the benefit of his advice, based on experience in the bureau.

The changes recommended by this committee are the result of practical experience in the administration of the law of 1910, they say. They further say that the importance of keeping in mind the necessity for completing the work of the Fourteenth Census within the census period, July 1, 1919, to July 1, 1922, was kept in mind at all times.

In this respect the work of the Thirteenth Census was not satisfactory, and criticisms followed, occasioned by the delay. The delay was not the fault of the Census Bureau. It was the fault of Congress. The fact that the law was not passed until July 2, 1909, made it impossible to organize the force and go to work in the proper time, and it is estimated that not less than $3,000,000 additional cost of taking the Thirteenth Census was the result, to say nothing of the delay in taking the census.

The committee further says that the modifications made in the existing law were considered necessary on account of the growth of the population and expansion of industry within the 10 years, to provide, first, for increases in the force beyond that authorized by the Thirteenth Census act. We assume that is entirely reasonable that it should be so, in view of the fact that the population of the country has increased from ten to fifteen millions of people in the decennial period.

Second, for such increase in salaries as, in view of the greatly increased cost of living and the rise in the general level of salaries, are regarded imperative to secure the personnel required for the efficient and expeditious prosecution of the work.

Third, to restrict the scope of the census within reasonable limits and avoid burdening the schedules with questions or inquiries of little value.

Fourth, to correct defects in the law brought to light in the prosecution of frauds committed in the Thirteenth Census enumeration.

These were proper matters to be considered by that committee, and to be presented to the Committee on the Census, and to be considered by the Committee on the Census in determining what change in the census act of 1910 should be made to meet those conditions.

The force required to take the enumeration of population and collect the statistics of agriculture will take between eighty-five and ninety thousand supervisors and enumerators.

The enumerators will be employed less than 60 days.

The bill fixes the minimum number of supervisors at 400. The law of 1910 fixed the number at 330. Then we had about 391 congressional districts in the United States, and now we have 435, and the population of many cities has greatly increased, and it was the opinion of this committee of experts who were active in taking the last census that 60 additional supervisors would be necessary if this work is done expediciously and efficiently.

To collect the statistics of manufactures and mines and quarries under substantially separate supervisions will require a special field force of fully fifteen hundred employees, and the number of other employees in the office will range from a minimum of 1,000 to a maximum of 5,000.

To organize and direct such a force requires a large number of competent administrators and supervisory assistants. To make the mass of data gathered easily accessible, readily understood, and convenient for reference, and their full significance and value shown, it is necessary that a large number of statistical experts shall be employed. In view of the fact that the value of the census depends upon the expedition and accuracy with which the work is done it is necessary to invest the director with large discretionary power in order that he may meet emergencies as they may arise and secure the assistance required to insure the uninterrupted and speedy completion of the work.

One criticism of the last census was the delay in collecting the information, the data, and making it available for the people. Hence the necessity of a complete organization in time to begin this work on the 1st day of January and to complete it before the 30th of June, 1922.

Now, I will not take time to call attention to the estimated cost of this census but will incorporate it in my remarks.

Now, should we take a census of agriculture? I wish to call attention to the fact that we did not go blindly about this matter, but the questions propounded here to-day and on yesterday occurred to the committee. In view of the fact that we are now engaged in a great war, the question occurred to us, Would it not be well to do no more than take a census of the population of the country. I think I suggested to my colleagues on the Census Committee that we had better investigate that question thoroughly, and that we should call in the heads of the Departments of Agriculture and Commerce, the Director of the Bureau of Mines, the Director of the Geological Survey, and go further and address communications to the various commercial bodies of the country, the manufacturers, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, and the Southern Commercial Congress, that we might get their viewpoints on this matter, and in every instance, as far as I have been able to ascertain, the answers came back that it is not only important that this census should be taken but that even if the war should continue the reason would be the greater why it should be taken.

Now, the Secretary of Agriculture was before the committee and made a very able and comprehensive statement. I quote from the hearings, page 197, a brief extract from Secretary Houston's statement:

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, the purpose in asking you to appear before the committee is due to the fact that there has been some expression in the committee in the preparation of the bill for the Fourteenth Decennial Census as to the necessity of an agricultural census, owing to the fact that business of every character, kind, and description is more or less abnormal by reason of war conditions. We will be pleased to have you give us your view on the necessity of taking an agricultural census along with the enumeration of the population, and such other matters as are provided in the bill. If you will kindly state in your own way your views, we will be very glad, indeed, to have them.

Secretary HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I shall speak primarily as to the bearing of such work on the activities of the Department of Agriculture.

Now, it is said there will be a duplication of work; that is one of the contentions made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY]. He continues:

The department is charged by law with the duty of issuing crop reports at stated times for the information of the farmers and others interested. It is charged with the duty, for instance, of estimating the number of acres planted to important crops, like wheat, cotton, corn, rye, and barley, as well as the number of each class of live stock. The estimates are based on the census. The actual enumeration forms the base line from which we proceed. Crop reporters, of whom there are 150,000 or more, are instructed to estimate the percentage of increase or decrease of acreage or of the number of each class of live stock, with reference to the preceding year. This is a simple matter for the year after the census returns are available. As time passes, as the census date recedes, the possibility of error increases and may become cumulative. It is absolutely essential to the operation of our work that we have the enumerations at least at 10-year intervals. We have suggested in the past that we have 5-year enumerations of certain things in order to lessen the margin of error.

I think very few people would doubt the necessity of having the estimates which the department is called upon to make, and no one would question the necessity of having them as accurate as possible. If the census were deferred for a year or for a number of years, our difficulties would correspondingly increase. The possibility of error would be greater. I suppose I need not enter into a discussion of the necessity of having actual facts as to production and the food supply.

Then he goes on to discuss the question in detail, and it will be well worth your time to read the whole of the Secretary's statement, but I will not detain the committee by reading further from his statement.

The next question that occurred to us was should a census be taken of manufactures, and the Secretary of Commerce, Hon. W. C. Redfield, was called before the committee. I now read from the hearings, page 177 and following, extracts from his very interesting and illuminating statement:

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, as you thoroughly understand, the Constitution requires an enumeration of the population every 10 years, and the bill before us also provides for a census of agriculture and manufactures and mines and quarries. We had Secretary Houston yesterday before the committee, who gave us his views on the necessity of a census full and complete bearing on agriculture. We would like to have your views as to the necessity and use by the business and commercial world of the statistics gathered by the Bureau of the Census, and also the service and use by the general public of the census relating to manufactures. There is some difference of opinion in the committee as to whether during this war period, on account of such an abnormal situation in the business world by reason of war conditions, it is advisable to take a census of manufactures, and the committee is anxious to have your views on that subject, and I think they are all anxious to understand as fully as possible the uses made by the business and commercial world of the statistics gathered by the Bureau of the Census in relation to manufactures.

Secretary REDFIELD. Speaking, then, if I may, first as a manufacturer myself for over 30 years, the census of manufactures taken by the Bureau of the Census is the ultimate, final basis of information. If I wish to know the growth of an industry, in relation to the industries of the country; if I need to know as a manufacturer any of the general facts concerning the industry at large or concerning any other industry or concerning the relations of one industry to another, there is where one must go for the final information. The practical difficulty to the manufacturer is that the censuses, so to speak, of manufactures are too infrequent; and for the reason they are five years apart they do not always afford, toward the close of that period, as up-to-date information as is desirable. They are helpful, but not as helpful as they would be if they were more closely to date. The ideal thing would be a census corrected annually. That, of course, we may assume to be impossible, but it is peculiarly true, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that in periods of rapid evolution the census becomes more important, more vitally important not only to commerce but to the Nation in every other respect than it is otherwise.

Perhaps we can best illustrate that by applying it to the present conditions; what is actually going on to-day. The last census of manufactures took place as of December 31, 1914. It is complete and available, but it is already so far away that it is practically out of date and useless for the immediate war purposes of the country.

I will say this bill provides for intermediate censuses of manufactures between the decennial census periods. The Secretary goes on to say:

Outside of our own particular line of industry and commerce let me suggest, for example, what will be obvious to you all—the immediate and instant need of the country's knowledge of spruce; not only of its spruce-growing resources but of its sawmill resources and its ability to handle spruce rapidly.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes, with pleasure.

Mr. WALSH. I notice in what the gentleman is quoting that the words "the immediate war necessities of the country" are used. Does the gentleman think that taking a census which is to begin in January, 1920, the information to be secured, not to be available until some months later, is providing any information that is going to be valuable for the immediate war needs of the country?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No, I do not; not unless the war should continue over the census period; but does the gentleman think it is not important that in the census of 1920 we should take a census of the manufactures of the country so that we know what our new industries are?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I think it is well to know what the industries are, but we should not do it under the guise or in response to an argument; we are doing it because of the immediate war needs of the country.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Nobody is making that argument and are not seeking to have the census of manufactures taken under any such guise as that.

Mr. WALSH. That is the argument the gentleman is reading.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think not. The Secretary is just speaking of this development growing out of the war, and among other things he says:

> Take for example the business that had grown up in fiber containers in this country, in the making of containers from fiber of various kinds to replace glass and to replace tin. There is not sufficient pig tin produced in the world now, and therefore we have got to use another kind of container.

What I understand the Secretary to say is that even these new industries have developed in this country since the war began, and I understand that he wishes to call attention to the fact and show the necessity to take the census, not postpone it to some future date, because it is important that the country should know what these new industries are for future use. Now, again, he says:

> While I am on this subject, I might mention the tin-smelting industry. I think it did not exist in this country in 1914. We brought it into operation in this country, I think, during that year. It may have been begun, but up to that time, while we were the greatest tin users in the world, we produced no tin ore and we had smelted no tin. We brought it all from abroad. Bolivian tin went by our doors to London, was smelted there, and came back. I think it was in the year 1914 that we arranged with the Bolivian Government to have tin ore sent here, and a small smelter was put up on Staten Island. That smelter doubled its size the early part of last year. It has now just added one half to the increased size, and we are now making 1,500 tons a month of pig tin on Staten Island.

I presume that will be one of the new industries of which we will take the census in 1920, and I think it would be of the greatest value to our manufacturers and commercial interests to have that information and not have the census postponed indefinitely, because perchance the war may be going on at that time. Then again he says:

> I might speak also for a moment of the dyestuffs industry. In 1914 it existed as an embryo. It was to its present size as an ant to an elephant. There were one or two very faithfully struggling concerns working amid great difficulties. Germany dominated the world on dyestuffs. To-day there are over $240,000,000 invested in the American dyestuffs industry.

I would think it would be important and valuable information for this country to have a census of that among other industries. The Secretary says further:

> I have here a few specimens of an entirely new industry; an industry showing how rapidly these changes can come. I will hand this to you, if I may, Mr. Chairman, pointing out that this is a book of fish leathers, leathers made wholly from skins of fishes, and I think you will agree that none of you ever saw anything of that kind before. There are now three concerns producing these goods regularly and growing with great speed. You will find there a very remarkable leather made from the skin of a whale; we now get 3,000 square feet of leather from each whale, and yet that industry even a year ago was not born. It is new, and a man without a census of that industry as it shall be, say, at the close of 1919 might live in entire ignorance of it. Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, you might in entire good faith debate upon the floor of the House of Representatives a commercial question affecting leather, and without a census of that industry would not be able to know, through no fault of your own, that here was an entirely new source of supply already largely developed.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Of course the gentleman would not contend that taking a census would make it any more valuable to the Government. The Government knows that plant is there and could get all the lenses it wants.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman think it is of vital importance to the interests of this country to take a census of the manufactures at all?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly, but I do not think the reasons that the gentleman is reading here are pertinent to the purpose of taking this census. The words which the gentleman has been quoting would lead one to assume that the gentleman who spoke them before the committee held to the view that if we take a census of these some department of the Government would hear of this great industry at Rochester that never heard of it before and therefore that industry would be of great value to the Government.

Now, I think it may be well for the people of the country to have knowledge of that, but I do not think this Committee of the Whole should be swayed by reasons which the gentleman is quoting here, and which seem not to rest upon any firm basis. I agree with the gentleman and have agreed with him, but I can not agree with those reasons.

Mr. ALEXANDER. He is citing facts as to the development of industries, and I am simply calling attention to the facts to show that it is important to take a census of manufactures in the country, not alone for the benefit of the Government, but for the information and benefit of all the people. The gentleman says he thinks it may be well to do that, and that is my contention.

Mr. WALSH. But that census that is to be taken is not going to be of any help to the War Department or the Navy Department in getting lenses for its periscopes or the sights upon these guns or field glasses or anything else.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It will be of equal value to the industries of this country if the war is then in progress or if the war is ended. It is taking an inventory of our national assets. This country, speaking of it as a whole, is the greatest business concern in the world. I do not know of any private concern that would neglect taking an inventory of its assets simply because the war is on. It would be absurd and unbusinesslike and lead to financial loss, if not ruin, to fail to do so.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. In just a moment. The Secretary says further:

> Another entirely new product of an old industry is the manufacture of aeroplane cloth from cotton. Every other nation in the world uses linen. We have no linen industry, and have been obliged to devise and manufacture on a large scale an entirely new fabric from cotton. Another entirely new industry is the manufacture of heavy, warm blankets of the best quality from cotton; warmer than wool, lighter than wool—all of which has been done within the last year.

Now, the Secretary simply calls attention to the development of these new industries and the importance of taking a census in order that this information may be collected and made available to the people of the country.

Mr. REED. It is certainly true that we need this information. We are now mobilizing the men and money and resources of our country, and are we not in immediate need of a lot of information along this line, and does it mean that this bureau will wait for this information we need now so much?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly not. But we will get it then in an accurate, permanent form, and all this data that is collected will be reviewed and analyzed by experts and be made available for the benefit of the people.

Mr. REED. We hope the war will be over by that time.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I certainly do.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit me to make an observation?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; if it is not too long.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not long as compared to the subject that the gentleman is citing as authority. I wish to simply state that the distinguished Secretary of Commerce is working overtime in using as an example a glass manufactured at the Bureau of Standards, and this latest citation of this new weave that was developed there, also, he used before the Subcommittee on Appropriations in the preparation of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill as a warrant for appropriations for the Bureau of Standards, and he now comes before the Committee on the Census to use it as a warrant for having a census of manufactures, because, he says, it may develop manufactures along that line. He made no such claim when he came before our committee. He was only looking for an appropriation for the Bureau of Standards.

Mr. WALSH. Probably they were all the samples the Secretary had in his case.

Mr. ALEXANDER. He does not say this is for the purpose of developing industries, but he tells us what is being developed, and it is information of the greatest value.

Mr. STAFFORD. That which he illustrated by sample in many instances, to which the gentleman has referred here, was not developed by the Bureau of Standards as a result of a study of the census of manufactures. I do not think that a business man of 30 years' experience would go into a business with a knowledge based on a census of manufactures.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is it the gentleman's opinion it is unimportant to take a census of manufactures?

Mr. STAFFORD. When determining whether or not it is advisable to go into the manufacturing business, investors do not consult the statistics in the Bureau of Manufactures or in the census of manufactures to see whether it is advisable or not.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If he is wise, he will do so. I will read what the secretary of the United States Chamber of Commerce says. I would like to have the gentleman know the reason for these things.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to have the opinion of somebody with practical knowledge.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not think the gentleman himself has practical knowledge, from what he says.

Mr. STAFFORD. I know that in the lines of manufacture in which I am interested I do not go, nor do manufacturers go, to any statistics of manufactures to determine whether it is profitable to invest in those lines.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman has ever read the volumes of the census relating to manufactures, he will find all the statistics or information collected in the census of 1910 have been collected and analyzed and classified by experts and statisticians from our universities and colleges and others, and have been reviewed and compared in connection with the development of industries in other countries, and are a mine of information to students of political economy and others interested in getting accurate information and who wish to engage in any industry intelligently; information that a man does not have the time to go and hunt for himself he will find collected for him. To show how this matter is viewed by the business men of the country, I wish to call attention to a letter addressed to the chairman of the committee, Mr. HELM, by the secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. He says:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C., March 27, 1918.

Hon. HARVEY HELM,
Chairman Committee on the Census,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: According to our point of view, there is very great importance in having taken, at the usual time, the census of manufactures, etc., to which you refer in your letter of March 23. There is a constantly increasing demand for authoritative information regarding domestic industry and domestic commerce. At present the census of manufactures is the only comprehensive and authoritative statement which we have for many industries. Fault is often found with the circumstance that, perhaps inevitably, the results of the census of manufactures are not published until they no longer refer to current conditions. This difficulty was overcome in a measure with respect to the census of 1914 by publication of a preliminary abstract.

Unless the census of manufactures, agriculture, mines and quarries is taken in 1920 we are very likely to be without information of very great importance, whether the country is then at war or has entered upon a period of peace. It seems beyond question that there will be under consideration questions of the highest importance with respect to adjustment of industries, the condition of agriculture, etc. According to our point of view, it would be extremely unfortunate if, when these questions come forward for consideration, we were not in possession of the data which would normally be collected as of 1920.

Even if it is assumed that war will be continuing in 1920, we should hope that, man power permitting, the census would be taken in order that its data might be available to show the changes which have occurred in industries and to indicate the relative rehabilitation which will be required when war closes. As you well know, the rehabilitation of British industries, for operation in the period which will follow the close of war, is at present a subject of very careful examination in England. If we should be at war in 1920, we should find it similarly important to have authentic data, taken upon a uniform plan for all industries in all parts of the country, as the basis for the conclusions which were reached with respect to the steps which should be taken to assure our future.

Hoping sincerely that the census to which you have referred will be taken at the usual time and that it will be found possible not only to make the results more quickly available than usual, but also to extend the comprehensiveness of the inquiry, I am,

Very truly, yours,

ELLIOT H. GOODWIN, Secretary.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Inquiries were sent out, I will say, to the chambers of commerce and other commercial bodies in the country and to manufacturers to get their viewpoint with reference to this question, because we knew the questions which have been propounded here would be pertinent and should be answered. And our information is to the effect that the opinion of the manufacturing and commercial interests of the country is quite unanimous that it is important not only to take the census of the population but the census of agriculture and manufactures and mines and mining.

We called the Director of the Bureau of Mines and the Director of the Geological Survey and asked them if a census of mines and quarries was taken it would not be a duplication of work. They said it would not. They said they get a very large volume of accurate information, but that when this census is taken the Bureau of Mines and the Director of the Geological Survey, in cooperation with the Director of the Bureau of the Census, will frame questionnaires and get the last word in information relating to these industries. This bill is no departure from the censuses of the past as regards information relating to agriculture, manufactures, mines, and quarries. This bill covers the same subjects, and the reasons that justified taking the census of agriculture, manufactures, mines, and quarries heretofore will apply with equal force in 1920.

My duties have been very exacting on the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, but I regarded this legislation of very great interest and importance; and notwithstanding the demands on my time from my own committee I attended most of the meetings of the Committee on the Census and took great pains to develop every fact that would be vital and on which we should have information in determining the advisability of taking this census.

I think you will find when we come to consider the bill under the five-minute rule that no changes have been made in existing law except those which are necessary. I think they will commend themselves to the judgment of the membership of the House.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. What does the gentleman mean when he says that no changes have been made in existing law?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I said except those that will commend themselves to the judgment of the House.

Mr. WALSH. With that exception, do I understand that under existing law they could go ahead and compile this information if the appropriations necessary were made?

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman has read the report of the committee——

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I have glanced through it, but I was referring to the gentleman's statement that no changes had been made in existing law.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I said with the exception of those that had been shown to be necessary. I do not care to go into the details now, but when we come to the discussion under the five-minute rule they will be developed if necessary.

Mr. WALSH. What I want to know is if this bill is a reenactment of existing law along certain lines?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Well, I will say that most of it is the language of the existing law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the committee whether the recommended bill as printed on pages 9 to 36 of the hearings on this bill is the bill as reported to the House?

Mr. ALEXANDER. There have been some changes from that, but not very many, and most of them are indicated in large type.

Mr. STAFFORD. So that you could virtually follow that bill and determine wherein changes have been made as compared with the existing law?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. HELM. This bill follows the Thirteenth Census bill about as closely as the Thirteenth Census bill followed the Twelfth Census bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was wondering whether I could follow that as a basis of comparison to determine what changes in the prior act have been made in the bill reported by the committee.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think so.

Mr. Chairman, I said I would incorporate in my remarks the estimated cost of taking the Fourteenth Decennial Census as furnished by the Director of the Census to the committee. It is as follows:

Estimated cost of Fourteenth Decennial Census, by inquiries, if taken at the same time.

Total, July 1, 1919, to June 30, 1921		[1] $17,987,000
Population, total		7,100,000
Field work, total (including outlying possessions)		4,500,000
Supervisors—salaries, expenses, and assistance	$750,000
Enumerators	3,600,000
Interpreters	50,000
Miscellaneous (remunerations, etc.)	100,000
Office work, total salaries		2,500,000
Mechanical laboratory—salaries, supplies, etc		100,000
Agriculture, total		6,049,000
Field work, total (including outlying possessions)		4,609,000
Supervisors—salaries, expenses, and assistance	$750,000
Enumerators	3,541,000
Irrigation	106,000
Drainage	170,000
Special field work	42,000
Office work, total salaries		1,440,000

[1] This total does not include the cost of making the following annual, quarterly, monthly, and semimonthly inquiries, which will be entirely separate and distinct from the decennial census work: Annual—birth statistics, mortality statistics, financial statistics of cities, general statistics of cities, and financial statistics of States; quarterly—tobacco stocks; monthly and semimonthly—cotton and cotton seed.

Manufacturers, total		$1,945,000
Field work, total (including outlying possessions)		959,000
Office work, total salaries		986,000
Mines and quarries, total		303,000
Field work, total (including outlying possessions)		97,000
Office work, total salaries		206,000
Administrative and general, salaries (director's office, administrative division, appointment division, disbursing office, geographer's division, publication division, and editorial division)		[1] 975,000
Printing[2]		775,000
Stationery, supplies, equipment (other than for mechanical laboratory), and rent		840,000

[1] Includes administrative and general costs applying to annual and other inquiries specified in note 1 on following table.
[2] In the following table the costs of these items are shown separately under the several inquiries.

Estimated cost of decennial censuses of population; agriculture, manufactures, and mines and quarries, if taken separately.

Grand total		[1] $22,204,000
Population, total		10,440,000
Field work, total (including outlying possessions)		6,400,000
Supervisors—salaries, expenses and assistance	$1,500,000
Enumerators	4,750,000
Interpreters	50,000
Miscellaneous (recnumerations, etc.)	100,000
Office work, total salaries		3,250,000
Printing		350,000
Mechanical laboratory—salaries, supplies, etc.		100,000
Stationery, supplies, equipment (other than for mechanical laboratory), and rent		340,000
Agriculture, total		9,171,000
Field work, total (including outlying possessions)		6,971,000
Supervisors—salaries, expenses, and assistance	$1,525,000
Enumerators	5,127,000
Irrigation	106,000
Drainage	170,000
Special field work	43,000
Office work, total salaries		1,620,000
Printing		200,000
Stationery, supplies, equipment, and rent		380,000
Manufactures, total		2,252,000
Field work, total (including outlying possessions)		959,000
Office work, total salaries		986,000
Printing		200,000
Stationery, supplies, equipment, and rent		107,000
Mines and quarries, total		341,000
Field work, total		97,000
Office work, total salaries		206,000
Printing		25,000
Stationery, supplies, equipment, and rent		13,000

[1] This total does not include the cost of making the following annual, quarterly, monthly, and semimonthly inquiries, which will be entirely separate and distinct from the decennial census work: Annual—birth statistics, mortality statistics, financial statistics of cities, general statistics of cities, and financial statistics of States; quarterly—tobacco stocks; monthly and semimonthly—cotton and cotton seed.

It will be seen from the foregoing tables that the cost of making separately the several inquiries which normally constitute a decennial census would be greater by more than $4,000,000 than the cost of making the inquiries in the usual way, as a part of one decennial census.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have surrendered the floor.

Mr. GOOD. Who has the floor?

Mr. HELM. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. NICHOLS] has the floor.

Mr. GOOD. I would like to know something in regard to the clerks.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] yield?

Mr. HELM. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I reserved the balance of my time and relinquished the floor.

Mr. GOOD. I would like to make inquiry in regard to the salaries of clerks. The report sets forth the fact that clerks in class 4 receive under the present law $1,800, the clerks of class 3 receive $1,600, the clerks in class 2 receive $1,400, and that clerks of class 1 receive $1,200. Now, I observe that you intend to make a new classification altogether for the clerks in the Census Bureau, which it seems to me increases the salary of those clerks in addition to the regular increase that is granted to other clerks, and the question that I wanted to propound to the gentleman is, Is there any reason why a regular clerk, qualified to do the business of a clerk of class 4 in the Census Bureau, should have any more compensation than a clerk of class 4 in any other department of the Government?

Mr. HELM. I want to say in answer to the gentleman's question—and I state it very frankly—that so far as there is any increase of salaries of clerks or staff officials or office force, I have opposed it. I think this arrangement is a departure from the other bill. I think it amounts to a substantial increase of 2½ per cent in the salaries of the clerical force.

Mr. GOOD. I think no one in the House, perhaps, in recent times has given more study to this matter than the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], who is chairman of the subcommittee on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, the bill which pays the salary of all these clerks. I know this is a very troublesome question, and it seems to me if you can enact this legislation increasing the salaries of these clerks over the salaries of like clerks in the other departments, you are going to do a great injustice to the other clerks in the departments in Washington, and you are going to write in the law something that is going to rise and plague us in the next appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from North Carolina unless some member of the committee asks recognition.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. MILLER of Washington. No.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, we had a gentleman's agreement among ourselves of two hours apiece.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the committee has an agreement for two hours on each side. The other side has now used two hours.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to state that the request for unanimous consent to limit the debate to three hours, giving the minority side two hours of that time, was objected to in the House, as the Chair understands it, and no private arrangement entered into now can be made good if objection is made.

Mr. GILLETT. Would not the Chair recognize the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY], who is opposed to the bill, and a member of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to state that the gentleman from Maine was recognized out of the time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. NICHOLS].

Mr. GILLETT. He yielded him time.

Mr. WALSH. That does not prohibit him from being recognized in his own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes that fact, but the Chair begs to state that it is an unusual thing.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time may be extended as we understood it. I renew the request for two hours on each side.

The CHAIRMAN. The request is made——

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBBINS. Was not the arrangement made for four hours' general debate—two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] and two hours by the gentleman from Michigan?

The CHAIRMAN. That request was made, but it was objected to, so that the committee has not been instructed as to the limit of general debate.

Mr. GILLETT. Does the Chair mean to say that he declines to recognize the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not mean to decline to recognize the gentleman. If the gentleman from Maine, under the circumstances, having had time heretofore, desires more time, the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. HERSEY. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maine in opposition to the bill.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Maine yield to me to make a motion that the committee rise for the purpose of receiving a report from the Committee on Appropriations through the subcommittee on fortifications?

Mr. WALSH. You can not make a motion for that purpose, but you can move that the committee rise.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses and had come to no resolution thereon.

FORTIFICATIONS BILL.

Mr. BORLAND, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 12541) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, which, with the accompanying report (No. 678) was ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman from the Committee on Appropriations if this is the last appropriation bill except the general deficiency bill?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; it is the last except the general deficiency bill.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I ask the gentleman from Missouri if he can inform the House when it is his intention to bring up this bill for consideration?

Mr. BORLAND. It is the desire of the committee to bring the bill up on Monday at the beginning of the session, and to consider it continuously during the sessions of the House until it is disposed of.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman entered into any arrangement with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM], who has charge of the pending census bill, looking to that end?

Mr. BORLAND. No. The bill now under consideration will, I understand, take some little time in the debate, and there is no desire to curtail the debate. So the best way is to pass the fortifications bill, which will not take a great while, and then go ahead with the census bill.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman does not intend to call up the fortifications bill before the hearings are printed, does he?

Mr. BORLAND. No; it is anticipated that the hearings, eliminating the matter that is confidential, will be ready for distribution to the Members of the House on Monday.

FOURTEENTH AND SUBSEQUENT DECENNIAL CENSUSES.

On motion of Mr. HELM, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think it is particularly unfortunate at this time that a bill of this nature should be presented for consideration, especially when the country is in the condition that it is at this time. The only justification I can see for bringing in such a bill at this time is that the Constitution provides for some such action; and, secondly——

Mr. ASWELL. Is not that a good reason?

Mr. McFADDEN. That is a reason.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COX. The Constitution does not provide for such a bill as this which the committee has brought in, does it?

Mr. McFADDEN. I would not care to say as to that. I am not a member of the Census Committee.

Mr. COX. The Constitution, as I recall it, provides only for a census of the population.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman is aware that the law providing for the Thirteenth and subsequent decennial censuses required that a census of manufactures, agriculture, mines, and quarries should be taken every 10 years thereafter, is he not?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HELM. And that this bill is in compliance with that law?

Mr. McFADDEN. If the gentleman will wait a moment——

Mr. HELM. I want the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] to understand that this bill is in response to that law.

Mr. STAFFORD. There may be need for the repeal of that provision.

Mr. McFADDEN. The only justification outside of what I have said is that the country is engaged in an industrial war, and that for that reason a census of the industrial situation should be taken. I agree thoroughly with the gentleman in that respect, but I can see no further reason for it. And it may be that some of the various war industries boards created since we declared war are now doing that. I mean by that taking an industrial census of the country, the cost of which is being paid for out of some special appropriation for some of these war boards.

If that is the case, this provision would be a duplication of work, and this right should not be granted.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will.

Mr. HELM. Has any Member introduced a bill to repeal the law authorizing and directing the taking of a census of manufactures, agriculture, mines, and quarries? Has any such bill been introduced by any Member who has criticized this bill, which complies with the former act of Congress requiring a decennial census of manufactures, agriculture, mines, and quarries? Does the gentleman know of any such bill?

Mr. McFADDEN. I do not; no.

Mr. Chairman, on January 25, 1918, in a speech which I made here on "The War and American Industries," I said:

> I want to protest against a policy that would close industries, whether it be by embargo, proclamations from the Railroad Administrator, or the Fuel Administrator, or by the manipulation of the Federal reserve banks or other banks refusing loans to industry, or in any other way restricting the full operation of the industries of the country, first, to furnish the materials necessary for the Government to win the war, and, second, to furnish employment affording a livelihood to the great mass of people who depend on their favorable employment for their existence.
> We need the full cooperation of all of the industries of this country, and if we do not get that our system is going to break down.
> To my mind it is a most serious situation that confronts us. Some people say, "Shut down the manufacture of nonessentials." I do not know what nonessentials are. I wish somebody would explain to me what are nonessentials. We certainly must keep industry going to the extent of supplying the things that are necessary for the Government to win this war; and, secondly, we must keep the network of industries going to supply employment to men who are engaged in other production, who must live and by their work support their families, or else we will have a more serious condition internally than might be brought about by the war.

Mr. Chairman, judging by subsequent developments, the administration has decided this much-discussed problem, and I would say that it is evident to anyone who is watching the situation closely that it is the policy of the administration to close all nonessential industries, or such industries as are not directly engaged in winning the war, so that now the keen observer is convinced that a line is being drawn between what are essential and what nonessential by those in authority.

By the issuance of priority orders both on raw materials and coal and also as regards shipments and travel on the railroads and by the restrictions of credit through the banks, the War Finance Corporation and the Capital Issues Committee restrictions, and by the monopolizing of the money market by the Government in requiring all banks to subscribe 5 per cent semimonthly to the Treasury certificates issued by the Treasury Department in anticipation of the subscription and payment for liberty loans, and, further, by the recent order of the President in regard to the transfer of labor from one vocation to another without first having consent of the Department of Labor the operation of most of these rulings and practices is strangling thousands of industries in the United States to-day, because the industries do not know whether their special industry is going to be made an exceptional case and are hanging by their eyelids.

Most of them think conditions surrounding their special industry, because of some special ability to secure money, labor, or materials, will be permitted to continue. But if I read the times correctly, it is the policy of the administration to close these nonessential plants.

In this connection, I believe that by this time the administration must know, or should know, the capacity of this country to produce war materials, and also what is and will be required to support an army sufficient to defeat the Germans. If it is going to take all our energy and resources to do the job, the quicker the industries and labor know this and are told frankly the better for us all.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. Does the gentleman understand that all industries not included in the A priority class are looked upon as nonessentials?

Mr. McFADDEN. I judge from the rules and regulations that are being promulgated and put into operation that the line is being drawn very closely.

Mr. SNYDER. In case the gentleman's suggestion is correct, and all industries not included in the priority A class should be put out of business, what effect does he think it would have upon the successful conduct and winning of the war?

Mr. McFADDEN. I think it would bring forth a very serious situation, but it may be necessary from the standpoint of the administration that these industries be shut down. But the industries, labor, and the American people should be told now.

Mr. WALDOW. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will.

Mr. WALDOW. Does not the gentleman believe a great deal of our present trouble is due to our lack of transportation of coal and other commodities, more than anything else?

Mr. McFADDEN. I do.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I prefer not to.

Mr. ASWELL. Just for a short question.

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ASWELL. Does not the gentleman believe that that fact makes it urgent and necessary to take a census, to see how we stand on that subject?

Mr. McFADDEN. I said virtually that a few moments ago; that that was one of the reasons I could see, if any real reason could be advanced.

Mr. SNYDER. I hope the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] did not get any idea that I was opposed to the measure, from anything I said in my remarks, for I am not in the slightest degree opposed to it.

Mr. McFADDEN. Why not be frank with the industries and labor now, and do away with the uncertainty that is now so distressing and is bringing ruin to so many, and then adopt a policy of putting all these nonessential plants and labor to work on necessary war work, or, at least, so far as possible, and distribute throughout the country in the many plants now already built and equipped with machinery and power the war business of the Government, which is now congested in a few favored plants, and thus preserve the local towns and communities in a tranquil position, and utilize labor that will not and can not be transferred bodily to war industries located far from the homes of laborers who now own their little homes and gardens? These industries that evidently must be closed have been the backbone of this country, and some thought must be given to the situation thus being created.

If these thousands of heretofore prosperous industries have to remain idle for the period of the war the Government will be deprived of a big source of income received from the taxes paid by these industries, and the income must be made up by increasing the taxes on the remaining industries which are permitted to continue and produce earnings, to say nothing of the hardship that will be caused by the closing down of these many heretofore prosperous industries scattered throughout the country in many cities and towns. The Government must give some consideration to these conditions existing in these towns and cities with a view of preserving good will toward the Government in these trying times. The good morale of our people must be preserved at all costs in times like the present.

There are appearing daily in Washington the heads of concerns who are seeking information from the various boards constituted by the administration to supervise industries.

These men are in doubt as to their status under present war conditions and are seeking information as regards their ability to continue their business; also to ascertain whether or not priority orders will be issued to them for the necessary raw materials and to cover shipping directions.

In addition to this, labor conditions throughout the country are such as to warrant and justify considerable alarm. The competition for labor is such that unheard-of wages are being paid and men are drifting from one plant to another in a careless sort of way that is destroying labor efficiency.

In this connection, my attention has been called to a communication dated New York, N. Y., June 18, 1918, signed by Henry A. Wise Wood, chairman of Conference Committee on National Preparedness (Inc.), calling attention to the labor situation in certain localities in the State of Pennsylvania, and pointing out the competition for labor paid in certain plants which are engaged in the making of shells for the United States Government and the allies and the other plants also engaged in the manufacture of material necessary for the prosecution of the war.

After a thorough investigation by the secretary of this committee it is found that all of these plants are bidding against each other for labor, with the result that the wage scale goes up; but there is no more labor in the community as the result of the high wage scale, and it is pointed out definitely as a result of this that inefficiency does result.

It is a well-known fact that at the present time there is no unemployment, either skilled or unskilled, and that Government projects, such as shipbuilding and munition plants, which are two of the most important branches of the war industry, together with the production of food, are at this time short 200,000 men. This is a serious situation, to my mind, and a condition that we must face and the people generally throughout the country must face and understand thoroughly what this means. We have only recently been reminded of the fact that by January 1, 1919, 3,000,000 men will be under arms, and unless these men are equipped with food, ammunition, arms, and the necessary clothing a serious situation will result.

These soldiers do not have eight-hour days or office hours, but some of them are standing amid the most trying conditions that ever confronted man or humanity for as long as 40 hours, without sleep and with hardly any food to sustain them during the stress.

What will happen to this army of three to five million men, containing our sons and brothers, if we are not able to keep them fully equipped with food and material after they get over there? It is fully time that the people of this country awakened to this condition and that industry and labor be fully informed. Our burden is just commencing, and we must speed up war industries and labor must work as it has never worked before.

If we are short 200,000 men now in the necessary war industry this labor must be secured from some source immediately. The only source from which it can be obtained, in the opinion of the administration, evidently is from the nonessential industries.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Is not that, in the judgment of the gentleman, the crucial test, the question of sufficient men to operate the shipbuilding and munition plants? Would it not be better for the administration to adopt some rule whereby certain industries less essential should be absolutely prohibited from operating during a certain period than to gradually by a process of indefiniteness starve all of the so-called nonessential businesses by giving them a little of this and a little of that and keeping them along day by day?

Mr. McFADDEN. That is exactly what I am suggesting here—that the administration be frank with the people and labor, so that they may know what industries may go on and what may not. The President recently issued an order which prohibits the transfer of labor from one industry to another without the consent of an elaborate board which is to be created. I am going to insert that order at this point.

RECENT PROCLAMATION OF THE PRESIDENT.

1. All recruiting of industrial labor for public or private work connected with the war shall be conducted through or in accordance with methods authorized by the United States Employment Service. The present working agreement between the Departments of Labor and Agriculture relating to recruiting of farm labor shall not be affected thereby.

2. The full power of the Government shall be exercised through such agency to supply all the labor requirements of war industry and by means of volunteer recruitment to transfer men to such extent as may be necessary from nonwar to war work.

3. This program shall be put into effect gradually, by first applying it, beginning with July 15, 1918, to unskilled labor, and thereafter as rapidly as possible to skilled labor. At the outset general authorization may be given (a) for hiring unskilled labor without solicitation; (b) for recruiting labor for railroads, farms, and nonwar work, and generally by employers whose full working force will not, with the addition of the labor recruited, exceed 100; and (c) for recruiting skilled labor. Such authorization by the United States Employment Service shall be given under regulations, to be approved by the War Labor Policies Board, calculated to prevent the taking of men needed in other war industries or on the farms.

4. All Government departments and private employers engaged in war work should furnish to the United States Employment Service a complete statement of their needs for unskilled labor and make such supplementary reports as may be requested of them. All the Government departments represented in the War Labor Policies Board should assist in every way in securing such information.

5. An immediate campaign to secure the unskilled labor needed in war work shall be made by the United States Employment Service. Recruiting for such purposes in each State shall be limited to quotas of the total demand, calculated on the basis of principles to be recommended by the United States Employment Service and approved by the War Labor Policies Board. All recruiting shall be conducted so that withdrawals from nonwar industries shall be distributed as equitably as is practicable.

6. Distribution of the workers recruited shall aim at transfers for the shortest possible distances and at the utilization of local supply so far as possible to meet local war needs.

7. For the purpose of equalizing the strain of transfers and adjustments of labor within local industrial communities, the United States Employment Service shall encourage the formation, under its guidance, of community boards, upon which there shall be an equal representation of labor and management, and shall cooperate fully with such boards in securing local quotas.

8. The War Labor Policies Board shall appoint a committee on labor priorities, to direct the United States Employment Service as to the questions which may arise when the available supplies of any kind of labor are inadequate to meet the immediate demands; such committee shall, in general, follow the priorities determined by the War Industries Board.

9. The primary effort to enforce the foregoing program shall be through public presentation of the need of compliance with it as a war necessity. The full authority of the departments of the Government represented on the War Labor Policies Board, including the power to cut off supplies, should be exercised as far as necessary. The United States Employment Service shall provide all the requisite machinery for the continuous enforcement of the foregoing program and the prompt report of any interferences therewith. A committee of the War Labor Policies Board shall be appointed, with authority to investigate reports of failure to comply with such program and to recommend appropriate action by the proper department of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, it can be plainly understood from these rules and regulations that conditions are judged abnormal by the administration, and that radical steps must be taken to supply the necessary industries with the labor which they need, and, realizing that some plan must be devised to assist, the proclamation of the President was resorted to.

The effort is to be commended, and I hope that the proclamation will solve the labor troubles, but I am fearful that it will not. If it does not, it seems to me that the next step, and the only remaining step to be taken to remedy the situation, is the conscription of labor for the necessary war vocations. We all understand and know that increased production must begin at once. I therefore insist that the people of the United States should know and understand the imperative needs of this situation, that it may be properly met by the whole American people. The fact that the business interests of the country have not been informed as to what is essential and what is not essential is, I understand, causing wide unrest and criticism, and it seems to me that not only those people who are coming to Washington seeking information be informed, but that the thousands of concerns which do not and can not come to Washington for light be informed at once regarding their status, now that the administration has evidently decided this much-discussed problem. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. Has the time for general debate been agreed upon?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD] 10 minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I will yield the balance of my time, 20 minutes, to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], and I ask that he be recognized after the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GILLETT. Has that side used its full two hours?

The CHAIRMAN. The majority has used 2 hours and 20 minutes and the minority has used 1 hour and 35 minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. May I suggest that after this hour has been used by the gentleman from Maine the gentleman from North Carolina be recognized in his own right?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine was recognized for one hour, and until he reserves the balance of his time or yields it he is entitled to the floor. Then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration was very carefully discussed in the committee that prepared it. There was only one dissenting vote in reporting it out. Every objection that has been brought to the Committee of the Whole here was made and carefully gone into on the part of the committee while the bill was being prepared. So far as the political phases are concerned the minority were not unconscious that in all probability the Democratic politicians, if you care to characterize them as such, would have a large share in determining who should take the census. I think, however, that the minority was also conscious that in years past the Democrats had not had a very large share in the census operations. So on the whole the committee was disposed to look at the measure on its merits, fully conscious that the Constitution requires that the census of the population be taken.

Under that requirement there must be sent into every household of this country an agent for the purpose of getting a census of the population. Relatively, a small additional amount will give a complete census of manufactures, agriculture, mines, and quarries. Much better, indeed, in my own judgment, would it be that the regularly organized statistical bureau that ought by this time to be capable of doing this work, have it in charge. That bureau would certainly give us a better success in a census of the manufactures, agriculture, mining, and quarries than hasty surveys made from time to time.

There has been some discussion as to the wisdom of introducing a bill at this time and having it acted upon so early. In my own judgment, if there is any kind of legislation worthy of the character that ought to be passed, if time sufficient can be given for due deliberation and effective organization, this House ought not to be insensible to the fact that thereby much better results will be obtained.

So that so far as that objection is concerned, it seems to me that it falls by the way, for certainly when this bill has passed there will not be too much time for the Census Bureau to organize its work in a thorough way and to make preparations for what will be one of the most important censuses that has ever been taken. Men have said here on the floor of the House that when conditions are abnormal we do not need a census. That is a strange argument to make. If a manufacturer found his business had been disorganized, that vast changes had been made in it, and he wanted to bring it back to normal conditions, he certainly ought to know where he is, what course it is necessary to pursue in order that he may get back to the normal status. It seems to me that argument falls of its own weight. There has been criticism to some extent of duplication. I think much of that criticism falls because the so-called duplication is in large part the interdecennial censuses that are taken from time to time. May I not say also that many of the so-called special inquiries and censuses are at best but estimates, based even yet upon the census that was taken in 1910, so that we are changing continuously, and the further we get away from the last census the more liability there is to error in the estimates that are made. It seems to me that at this time of all others thorough, exact information as to how far our industries have been deranged is requisite. There have been not only derangements of old industries, but new industries have come in, notably the industry with regard to optical instruments, and with regard to dyestuffs. In the readjustment that is coming there will be legislation needed. I know of nothing that will be more valuable to the men who may sit in the Congress for that readjustment than to be able to say, "I know with regard to this industry; I know its output; I know the number of men engaged in it; I know the conditions surrounding the industry; and therefore I am able to speak with something of confidence when I make an argument."

I will say to the gentlemen present—and most of the gentlemen present to-day are on the Republican side—that it is wise in the study of this to study basically the merits of the bill, having only that thought in mind, fully conscious that to-day perhaps as never before men need knowledge. I believe that in this House there is adequate intelligence for the directing of legislation, but again and again there have been matters brought before us with which we are not familiar and upon which there is no adequate data. Some men question the accuracy of the census, and while I know there has been a disposition to speak disparagingly of the judgment of the heads of departments, I am inclined to think that they are not altogether stupid, and perhaps not always venal, if ever so; and it may be, after all, when you have studied carefully the hearings of the committee, upon which its judgments are based, and see what was actually revealed, you will agree with the committee that it is wise to report the bill out at this time and that a comprehensive census should be taken. That was the very problem to which the committee addressed itself more than any other problem, with the result that all but one member of the committee were convinced not only of the wisdom, but, in view of what we shall face, of the necessity of an adequate census covering the population, agriculture, manufactures, quarries, and mines. [Applause.]

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I avail myself of this opportunity to submit to the Congress and the American people the testimony of Gen. Pershing on the enviable record being made by four colored regiments now in France on the firing line. The statement of the commander of our forces on the western front will silence the many false reports put in circulation in this country as to the treatment and the conduct of the colored soldiers who are a part of our brave and invincible Army which is maintaining the glorious traditions of the American Army and Navy.

Many of these soldiers come from the districts I represent, and I am proud of the record they are making in defending our rights and in doing their best to make the world free and America safe and secure for all time.

Here is Gen. Pershing's just tribute to these men:

The stories, probably invented by German agents, that colored soldiers in France are always placed in most dangerous positions and sacrificed to save white soldiers; that when wounded they are left on the ground to die without medical attention, etc., are absolutely false.

FIGURES ON THEIR LOSSES.

The following are the losses as reported up to June 18 in the four colored combatant regiments now in France: The Three hundred and sixty-ninth Infantry—Died of wounds, 3; died of disease, 8; severely wounded, 2. The Three hundred and seventieth Infantry—Died of wounds, none; died of disease, 3; severely wounded, none. The Three hundred and seventy-first Infantry—Died of wounds, none; died of disease, 8; severely wounded, none. The Three hundred and seventy-second Infantry—Died of wounds, none; died of disease, 3; severely wounded, none. These figures show conclusively that negro troops have not thus far occupied positions as dangerous as those occupied by white troops and that their physical condition is excellent.

A tour of inspection just completed among American negro troops by officers of the training section of these headquarters show the comparatively high degree of training and efficiency among these troops. Their training is identical with that of other American troops serving with the French Army, the effort being to lead all American troops gradually to heavy combat duty by a preliminary service in trenches in quiet sectors.

Colored troops in trenches have been particularly fortunate, as one regiment had been there a month before any losses were suffered. This was almost unheard of on the western front.

TELLS OF FINE SPIRITS.

The exploits of two colored infantrymen some weeks ago in repelling a much larger German patrol, killing and wounding several Germans and winning the croix de guerre by their gallantry, has aroused a fine spirit of emulation throughout the colored troops, all of whom are looking forward to more active service.

The only regret expressed by colored troops is that they are not given more dangerous work to do. They are especially amused at the most dangerous positions and all are desirous of having more active service than has been permitted them thus far. I can not commend too highly the spirit shown among the colored combat troops, who exhibit fine capacity for quick training and eagerness for the most dangerous work.

In addition to this high praise by Gen. Pershing, I will add the brief judgment of other commanders of the American Army and Navy in some of our previous wars on the faithful services of our colored soldiers:

Commodore Perry, after the Battle of Lake Erie: "They seemed to be absolutely insensible to danger."

Gen. Jackson, after the Battle of New Orleans: "You surpassed my hopes. * * * The Nation shall applaud your valor."

Gen. Grant, speaking of the negro in the Civil War: "The colored troops fought nobly."

Col. Theodore Roosevelt, speaking of the negro soldiers in the Spanish-American War: "No troops could behave better than the colored soldiers."

Not only in the ranks are the colored citizens of the Republic doing their full duty, but in ammunition plants, in the mines, on the farms, and in every line of endeavor they are willingly, cheerfully, and loyally aiding in the speedy and successful prosecution of the war. In my section they have not only furnished their full quota for the Army but have liberally subscribed to the three liberty loans, the Red Cross work, and the Army Y. M. C. A.

It gives me pleasure to place upon the enduring records of this great Government this brief but true and deserved tribute to the loyalty, fidelity, and patriotism of the colored citizens of America. [Applause.]

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, this will be characterized as a war measure, and everyone will be supposed to vote for it whether it aids in the remotest degree toward bringing the war to a successful and rapid conclusion or not. I have heard none of the debates, being busy in committee. I expect a large part of what I shall say has been said time and again by other gentlemen. I am unable to understand and I never will be able to understand the necessity for taking such a census as this in time of war.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Did the gentleman take the time to read the hearings before the committee?

Mr. COX. Yes; I read the hearings before the committee last Sunday instead of going to church, as I should have done. It has been said here that it is constitutionally necessary to take a census. I know of no provision in the Constitution or in any law now upon the books or of any law that Congress could pass that would hold anyone guilty in the event that the next census should not be taken at all.

Mr. HELM. Did not the gentleman swear to support the Constitution?

Mr. COX. Yes; and I intend to obey it, but conceding that it is necessary to take a constitutional census, what does that mean? Does it mean that we have got to go out and take a complete abstract and survey of every industry in the country? The fathers who framed the Constitution probably knew as much about this as we do, or more, did not take that view of it at all. The first act that Congress passed for the taking of a census was passed on the 1st day of March, 1790, and under consent of the House I hereby insert an abstract of the laws for taking of the census down to and including 1910:

ABSTRACT OF LAWS FOR TAKING THE CENSUS.

First Census: Statistics of population to be taken. (Act of Mar. 1, 1790; 1 Stat., 101.)

Second Census: Statistics of population to be taken. (Act of Feb. 18, 1800; 2 Stat., 11-14.)

Third Census: Statistics of population to be taken. (Act of Mar. 26, 1810; 2 Stat., 564-568.)

Manufacturing establishments to be reported. (Act of May 1, 1810; 2 Stat., 605, sec. 2.)

Fourth Census: Statistics of population, distinguishing the number of persons engaged, respectively, in agriculture, commerce, and manufactures to be taken; manufacturing establishments and their products to be reported. (Act of Mar. 14, 1820; 3 Stat., 548-553.)

Fifth Census: Statistics of population, distinguishing the number who are deaf and dumb and those who are blind, to be taken. (Act of Mar. 23, 1830; 4 Stat., 383-389.)

Sixth Census: Statistics of population, distinguishing the number who are deaf and dumb, those who are blind, and those who are insane or idiots, and indicating how many of the insane and idiots are a public charge, to be taken; also special census of pensioners, and statistical tables of information relating to mines, agriculture, manufactures, and schools. (Act of Mar. 3, 1839; 5 Stat., 331-337.)

Seventh Census: Census Board to prepare such schedules for collecting statistics of population, "mines, agriculture, commerce, manufactures, education, and other topics as will exhibit a full view of the pursuits, industry, education, resources of the country." (Act of Mar. 3, 1849; 9 stat., 402.)

Statistics of population, etc., to be taken according to schedules supplied by the Secretary of the Interior, which schedules must include population, occupation, value of real estate owned, education (literacy and school attendance), number of persons deaf and dumb, blind, insane, idiotic, pauper, or convict, agriculture products of industry, social statistics (schools, churches, libraries, newspapers, value of property, taxes), and deceased persons. (Act of May 23, 1850; 9 Stat., 428-436.)

Eighth Census: The rules for preparing schedules, etc., for the Eighth Census were determined by the act of May 23, 1850, above. Appropriations for the taking of the Eighth Census were included in the acts of March 3, 1859 (11 Stat., 428), June 25, 1860 (12 Stat., 108), February 19, 1861 (12 Stat., 132), and March 2, 1861 (12 Stat., 218).

Ninth Census: The rules for preparing schedules, etc., for the Ninth Census were determined by the act of May 23, 1850, above. Additional provisions (not affecting the forms of the schedules) were made in the act of May 6, 1870 (16 Stat., 118), joint resolution of June 9, 1870 (16 Stat., 380), and act of March 3, 1871 (16 Stat., 514). Appropriations for the taking of the Ninth Census were included in the act of April 20, 1870 (16 Stat., 88), and March 3, 1871 (16 Stat., 503).

Tenth Census: Statistics of population, wealth, and industry to be taken; the schedules being similar to those for the Seventh Census, but including statistics as to marital condition, place of birth of parents, physical and mental condition, unemployment, amount of power employed in industry and number and kind of machines, public indebtedness of cities, etc., and ownership of public debt of the United States, and omitting value of property owned. Special reports were required from railroad companies, express companies, telegraph companies, and insurance companies. (Acts of Mar. 3, 1879; 20 Stat., 473-481; and Apr. 20, 1880; 21 Stat., 75-76.)

Eleventh Census: Census of population, wealth, and industry to be taken; schedules to be similar to those for Tenth Census, but to include special inquiry as to Civil War service and as to corporations reporting other than agricultural products. (Act of Mar. 1, 1889; 25 Stat., 760-767.)

Inquiry to be made as to ownership of farms, mortgages, etc. (Act of Feb. 22, 1890; 26 Stat., 13.)

Twelfth Census: Census of population, deaths, and manufacturing, mechanical and agricultural products to be taken; schedules to relate only to population, mortality, and products of agriculture and of manufacturing and mechanical establishments; population schedules to include mental condition, occupation, education, and ownership of home. Special inquiries authorized as to defective classes, criminals, vital statistics, social statistics of cities, public indebtedness, etc., religious bodies, electric light, power, telephone and telegraph business, transportation by water, express business, street railways, and mining. (Act of Mar. 3, 1899; 30 Stat., 1014-1021.)

Permanent Census Office: Census Office made permanent; special inquiries authorized in act of March 3, 1899, above, authorized decennially, vital statistics to be collected annually; statistics of manufactures to be collected in 1905 and decennially thereafter; statistics of cotton production to be collected annually. (Act of Mar. 6, 1902; Stat. 32, pp. 51-53.)

Other duties have been given to the Census Bureau from time to time, e. g., by joint resolution of February 9, 1905 (33 Stat., 1282); consequently there is not now the same concentration at the decennial period as formerly.

Thirteenth Census: Census of population, agriculture, manufactures, and mines and quarries to be taken; schedules to relate only to population, agriculture, manufactures, and mines and quarries; population schedules to include marital condition, occupation, education, ownership of home and Civil War service. (Acts of July 2, 1909; 36 Stat., 1-11; Feb. 25, 1910; 36 Stat., 227-228; and joint resolution of Mar. 24, 1910; 36 Stat., 877.)

NOTE.—Every provision noted above with regard to population schedules has included a requirement of classification by color, sex, and age, such classification being somewhat more elaborate in the recent than in the earlier acts.

It will be seen that the First Census provided only for the statistics of population.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. HERSEY. That is all the Constitution provides, is it not?

Mr. COX. That is all the Constitution provides.

Mr. HELM. Were there any manufactures in the United States at that time?

Mr. COX. Oh, yes.

Mr. HELM. What were they?

Mr. COX. There were not as many as there are now nor were there as many people then as there are to-day.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Does the gentleman think a census should be taken of manufactures in time of peace?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. And not in time of war?

Mr. COX. No.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Does not the gentleman believe that the statistics that may be gathered now of the extraordinary and abnormal conditions in industrial life should be a matter of record for the future?

Mr. COX. Not at all, because statistics that are going to be gathered by this census will not be available until 1925.

Mr. LARSEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX. I can not yield.

Mr. LARSEN. For just one question.

Mr. COX. I can not yield any more. The census of 1800 provided only for the taking of a census of population. Twenty years after the fathers adopted the Constitution no provision was made for the taking of anything except of population. Not until 1810 did Congress provide for the taking of a census of manufacturing establishments, including that of population. Not until 1820 did Congress provide for the taking of a census of agriculture and manufacturing industries likewise. This résumé of the various laws passed by Congress is interesting in more ways than one. Of all the 13 censuses which have been taken in this country there were never but two of them provided for before the year the census actually was taken. The census of 1850 was provided for in 1849. The census of 1870, if I recall correctly—and if not I will be corrected—was provided for in 1869. You can take this census of agriculture and you will get the agricultural reports about 1925—that is about when they will be ready for distribution—and we certainly all hope and fervently pray with all the fervor of our souls that this war will be over before then.

Mr. HELM. Is the gentleman aware of the fact the Census Bureau issues bulletins and summaries of its work as reported and——

Mr. COX. I am well aware of the fact that a refusal to take a census of agriculture would not retard for a moment the work the gentleman mentions. That kind of work would go right on whether you take an agricultural census or not in the future exactly as it is going on to-day. Now, if nobody else does it, I do not suppose it would get very many votes, but if no one else moves to strike out the words "agriculture, manufactures, mines, and quarries," I propose to do it myself, and I am one of the last men, I think—at least if I know myself—who would do anything that would tend in the remotest degree to cripple any industry of this country that with the furtherest stretch of imagination would help to aid in this war. But I was struck very forcibly by the argument made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] about the shortage of labor in this country.

I do not quite agree that there is a shortage of labor, as he puts it, but I think if we raise the draft age to 45 we would soon overcome the shortage of labor in this country, and put three, four, or five million people of this country to-day either in the Army or put them at work. But I saw a statement in the papers when this hearing was going on, whether true or not I do not know, that it would require the work of a hundred thousand people in the United States to complete this census. Now, can you just explain to me, any man, how in the world the taking of 100,000 people away from the factories, the mines, the fields, and other industries and putting them to the work of taking an agricultural census or of a mining or manufacturing census, how that is going to help to win the war. I do not think it would.

Mr. HELM. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that it only requires less than 1,500 persons to take a census of manufactures?

Mr. COX. I helped to frame the last census bill, at least I was on the committee but did not do much work on it, being a new member, but I was on the committee. How many people it took to complete that census I do not know, but if my recollection serves me correctly it took between 90,000 and 100,000 to take the last census, in one way and another.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman makes the statement in reference to manufactures.

Mr. COX. I am making a statement in reference to all the censuses provided for in the bill of the gentleman here. I make the statement in regard to the census of population, of agriculture, manufacturing, mining. I am trying to cover the whole field.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. HELM. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that it will require every single solitary human being to take a census of population that it will to take a census of manufactures?

Mr. COX. Why, no; I am not aware of that, and, in my opinion, if the gentleman will go to the library——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. Can I have about three or four minutes more?

Mr. HERSEY. We can squeeze the gentleman out three minutes, I guess.

Mr. COX. Go to the library, and I think you will find that many of the European nations absolutely take their censuses through their post-office facilities, and I undertake to say that instead of spending $20,000,000, as this bill will finally cost, a constitutional census could be provided for by a census that would comply with the Constitution for less than $1,000,000. But I am well aware of the fact there is not much use talking about saving $18,000,000 or $20,000,000. That does not amount to much, but it is that much, and in view of the fact that the war expenses this coming year are going to be not less than $24,000,000,000, it might be the part of wisdom for some of us to look over and see where we can economize even by saving a little insignificant sum of $18,000,000 or $20,000,000.

Now, I repeat I do not want to cripple a single industry of the United States. Far from me ever to do anything that would retard the progress of this war, but you can take the agricultural census provided for in this bill and you will not raise a single extra bushel of wheat, corn, rye, oats, or barley; you will not raise a single extra pound of pork or a single pound of——

Mr. HELM. And by taking a census of population you will not raise a single human being.

Mr. COX. You will not be able to produce an extra pound of powder or an extra bushel of coal. But you take from the industries of this country laboring people, men and women, who ought to be producing something that should go to winning the war. This is a war measure, I suppose. Is there an increase of salaries here? I see they have provided here for an increase of the salary of the director to $7,500 a year. The four Assistant Postmasters General get $5,000 a year each. The Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States gets $6,000 a year; and yet over his signature every dollar of money that this country expends has got to be certified to by him as being correct. But as a war measure the salary of the Director of the Census must be increased to $7,500 per year, and many of the other salaries increased in here. I have been informed, not directly, however, that the able chairman of this committee is not in favor of that, and I want to compliment him for it. Now, then, if anyone can show me how the increase of salaries can come in here as a war measure and how it is absolutely necessary and essential to win the war, so far as I am concerned I am not going to raise any row about it, but "I am from Missouri" on that point. Some one has got to show me that it is necessary to increase the salary before I agree to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Chairman, there has been a new and startling philosophy announced on the floor of this House in connection with this bill, and that is the philosophy that we are more in need of a complete census in a time of peace than we are in time of war. That idea is absolutely at variance with the history of every nation of the world in time of war. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, if there ever was a time in the history of this Nation when the people should know exactly its resources, not only in man power but in every resource, it is now, when we are in war for the preservation of our very institutions, and it therefore startles me to hear this philosophy advocated on the floor of the House. A census in the time of peace is only for historical value or industrial purposes, but in a time of war, when we have now made provision for over 3,000,000 of our people at the front, we should have every particle of knowledge that it is possible to get by the most complete census.

Now, I have heard it advocated on the floor of the House here that because we are at war and amid abnormal times that the data obtained will be of no value, of no service to us in time of peace. I would like to ask some of these gentlemen advocating that thought if they know when the time of peace is coming? The nations of the world have been at war now for nearly four years, and I can see nothing in the immediate future as to the coming of peace. In fact, I believe that the last four years of this war will be worse than the first four years. Now, if that is true, or if there is any philosophy in it, the gathering of statistics when abnormal conditions exist, if the abnormal condition is going to exist, will be of value to us in the prosecution of this war and of especial service as long as the abnormal condition exists.

The committee considered these phases of the question, and, as was said by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD], we all, except one Member, agreed that it is necessary at this time to have complete data taken.

Now, as to this political situation, I recall when the last census was taken that my own section of the country did not overflow with Democratic employees on the pay roll. I do not know what we are to gain politically by delaying the passage of this bill a few months. We are in an administration that is Democratic; the Senate is Democratic; the House is Democratic; every governmental activity is Democratic. I can see little hope for the Republicans to win a victory in time to get on the pay roll of this census. If this census bill is delayed until after a new Congress shall come in, and that Congress be Republican, I can see little opportunity of the political complexion of the Senate or administration being changed within the necessary time; and besides in that interval between March and June there will not be time, with the political complexion being changed, to pass a census bill and let the machinery be organized in time for the commencement of the taking of the census. I am forced to be content to let the Democratic Party have it. We would welcome, of course, civil service, but I have not yet seen the time when the Democratic Party is very zealous in behalf of civil service. I am willing under the conditions we now face for the provision of the bill to go through, Mr. Chairman. I know we need the census and need it badly when we are in a war which will ultimately strain every resource of the country. We all want to know what those resources are, not only in man power but in everything else.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MILLER of Washington. The gentleman can have time if he desires some.

Mr. WALSH. I wanted to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. I have used my time.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to a statement put in the RECORD yesterday by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS]. It is, in my opinion, a very unjust and unfair criticism of the Congress. I can not think my friend intended it as a reflection upon the House, but an outsider, in reading his statement, would come to the conclusion that Congress has been derelict in passing measures to break up sabotage and detect and punish spies. My friend says:

With the hope that our Department of Justice may be stimulated to greater activity, and that this Congress will enact more stringent laws, for such are required—

And so forth.

Let me say that the Department of Justice, in the opinion of a great many lawyers and in the opinion of Congress, and, I think, in the opinion of every fair-minded man—and certainly in my opinion—has been most active, zealous, persistent, and faithful in the performance of its duty, and this Congress has not refused to give the Department of Justice such laws, so far as I know, that the department has asked for. I do not care to pay tribute to the work of the Department of Justice, but I do not see any criticism that can be justly lodged against that great department in these times. It has had its hands full. It has had a job that is herculean in its nature, and everybody knows it has performed its duty well. I do not think a criticism to the effect that it ought to be "stimulated to further activities" justly lies, because it has been and now is active in every part of the United States and in our Territories, and has performed some great work during the last two years.

Now, my friend goes on to say:

Turning to the calendar of this House we find a large number of bills that have been introduced for the purpose of suppressing these acts of lawlessness against our country and our citizens.

First. House bill 9504 purports to be an amendment to section 4067 of the Revised Statutes extending the provisions of the criminal act to women over 14 who are alien enemies and commit acts of hostility during the war.

My friend has misinterpreted the act entirely. That bill has been passed. It is not pending here. It is the law now. The old law only included "male." I introduced a bill to strike out "male," so that it includes all alien enemy people of 14 years and over that may be interned and restricted by the President. The death penalty would not, as my friend suggests, have any place in an act of that sort. But he says:

This act lacks the death penalty, which it should have attached to it in order to make it a terror to criminals of this class.

It is no criminal statute at all. It has been on the statute books for 125 years, I believe, and gives the President the power when a war is on to restrict alien enemies. It only restricted alien men 14 years old and upward, and we made it apply to women of that age as well. There is no place for the death penalty, for it is not a criminal statute. The provision passed the House, and my friend at the time offered no amendment providing for a death penalty, and therefore I do not think he ought to criticize it now.

And then he says:

Second. House bill 10068 is pending in the House, not yet acted upon, proposing during the present war to punish those convicted of conspiracy to destroy property of the United States necessary for the prosecution of the war, by fine and imprisonment, which is entirely inadequate as a means of preventing the crimes that are being committed at this time, a list of which I will append to my remarks.

Mr. Chairman, the substance of H. R. 10068 is already the law. If my friend will read the public act approved by the President on April 20, 1918, sections 2 and 3, he will find that that bill substantially is entirely covered by that act, which has already passed the Congress and under which the Department of Justice is now operating. I judge from what my friend says as to the bill on sabotage that is pending in the House that we are so averse to passing laws curbing spies and sabotage that we will not pass it, whereas, as a matter of fact, we have already enacted into law a most stringent sabotage provision.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. With pleasure.

Mr. WALSH. Has the committee over which the gentleman presides so ably at any time refused to report out any bill providing for penalties that have been asked by the President or the Attorney General?

Mr. WEBB. Not at all. In some cases we have increased the penalties asked for by the Department of Justice.

Mr. WALSH. Are there measures pending before the committee, asked by the President or the Attorney General, on which action has not been taken?

Mr. WEBB. I do not recall a single one, I will say to my friend.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. May I invite the gentleman's attention to Senate bill 7141, which passed the Senate on the 7th day of May, intended to stop the I. W. W. activities?

Mr. WEBB. Yes. Let me cover this first. I want to cover what my friend from Pennsylvania says. I read:

Third. House bill 10204, now pending in the House, also provides for the punishment of those who willfully injure or destroy war materials or war premises during the war. It provides punishment only of fine and imprisonment, which will be invaluable as a deterrent for the criminals with which it proposes to deal.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if my friend will read the sabotage bill, which was approved April 20, 1918, public law No. 135, he will find that the bill he refers to is absolutely covered, not only in substance but much enlarged, in the sabotage bill, which is as complete and as drastic a law as probably was ever passed by any Congress, in a Republic certainly. Yet the impression is made that that bill is still pending here, and that nobody cares enough about it to enact it into law.

Fourth. House bill 10629 is a bill providing for the death penalty of those convicted as spies, which bill has not as yet been reported by the committee, but is a very proper bill to be enacted.

Mr. Chairman, that bill was introduced long after the espionage law was passed. It was introduced by Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania in March, 1918, whereas in June, 1917, the Congress had already passed public law No. 24, providing a death penalty for all persons convicted of acting as spies.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. ROBBINS. The act the gentleman refers to does not inflict the death penalty.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; it does. The act the gentleman refers to talks about people being convicted as spies. Now, what is a spy? It is covered by the espionage law, and on page 2 of the espionage law my friend will find that anybody convicted of being a spy or giving information to the enemy shall suffer death. That is the death penalty. Yet the impression is made by my friend that we have no law on the statute books in regard to spies which carries a death penalty.

Fifth. House bill 10630 is of similar import, but has not been considered or acted on by the House.

It is identical with Mr. KELLY's bill, just referred to. Yet we get the impression from the gentleman's remarks that nine of these bills have not been enacted into law, and that the country is suffering from a lack of proper legislation to protect itself from the acts of spies. Further, the gentleman says:

Sixth. House bill 11232 is a bill pending in the House to prohibit the activities of spies and prevent the injury to forts, docks, and munition plants, whether owned by the Government or engaged in Government activities, and provides for a death penalty upon conviction. This bill has not been acted upon and is still in committee.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the espionage law as amended and the sabotage law cover practically every word—and in a more minute and comprehensive way—every word in that House bill that my friend refers to as House bill 10068 and House bill 11232. And yet we get the impression from him that that bill is lying here, very badly needed, and that nobody cares enough about it to attempt to enact it into law, whereas the Department of Justice has been operating under such a law for quite a while.

Seventh. House bill 11187 is a bill to provide for the punishment of disloyalty, sabotage, and acts of terrorism, and provides a fine and imprisonment only as a punishment if convicted under its provisions. This bill is pending in committee and has not been acted upon. The punishment is entirely inadequate to make the bill effective if it should follow out its provisions, but it probably will not.

I do not know of a man in this House who does not know that we passed a sabotage bill, a very drastic, comprehensive, severe sabotage law, which seemed to please even the death-penalty advocates. I did not hear my friend from Pennsylvania, when the bill was passed, urging the infliction of the death penalty. I think the penalty therein prescribed may be a fine of $10,000 or 10 years' imprisonment.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. That law does not have the death penalty in it.

Mr. WEBB. No; but why did not the gentleman offer an amendment to that bill when it was considered by the House?

Mr. ROBBINS. I did; but it was not accepted.

Mr. WEBB. I do not remember the gentleman's doing such a thing. I do not think anybody in the House even suggested an amendment. But it is a law, although the death penalty is not in it.

Eighth. House bill 11279 is a bill introduced to protect citizens against lynching in default of protection by the States, and refers to the conditions that exist in Missouri, but the punishment provided does not exceed five years' imprisonment or $5,000 fine. This bill is pending and probably will not be acted upon for the obvious reason that its penalties are totally inadequate and it would be ineffective if passed.

I call upon my friend to say whether he would vote for that bill now, to turn over to the Federal Government the power to punish men for killing one another in cases of lynching. I know the gentleman would not vote for that bill that the Judiciary Committee have not acted upon yet, and probably will not act upon it soon. But if we should bring up such a bill as that I do not believe it would get many votes in the House.

Ninth. House joint resolution 275 is for the purpose of permitting the United States to dismiss from its employ those who are guilty of disloyalty or utter any unpatriotic, disloyal, abusive, or seditious language, or who in an abusive and violent manner criticize the President, the Army or Navy, or the flag. This resolution has not been considered by the committee. I have introduced a bill providing for the death penalty for those convicted of these crimes where death results, which I hope will pass.

It is unfair to the Judiciary Committee to say that. The committee has considered that measure and it has been a law for some time, and I suppose by this time hundreds of employees of the Government have lost their heads under that law.

I want to read to my friend what is already the law on that subject. If he will just go to the document room and get these pamphlets containing the statutes which have been passed, he will find that we have passed a very severe statute penalizing any Government employee who commits any disloyal act or utters any unpatriotic or disloyal language. This has been the law since April 16, 1918. Yet the gentleman criticizes not only the Judiciary Committee but the whole Congress of the United States on the ground that we have not passed some law covering the ground contained in resolution No. 275. This has been the law since April 16, 1918:

Provided, That any employee or official of the United States Government who commits any disloyal act or utters any unpatriotic or disloyal language, or who in an abusive and violent manner criticizes the Army or Navy, or the flag of the United States, shall be at once dismissed from the service.

Now, that is the law, and yet it goes out over the country in 30,000 or 40,000 copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that there is no law of this character, and that the Congress of the United States will not pass one, when, as a matter of fact, we passed it about two months ago. My friend says in concluding his remarks:

From this review of the pending legislation it is quite evident that Congress has not been up until this time sufficiently active in passing laws to punish the enemies of our country. I hold no brief in this case against the Members of Congress to criticize those responsible for this record. I am quite well aware as a Member of this body that the infliction of the death penalty has been abolished in probably one-third of the States of the Union, and is regarded with disfavor by a vast and growing proportion of our people.

* * * * * * *

Therefore I believe that I have shown that the necessity for the enactment of legislation in regard to this situation is imperative, and those charged with the duty of bringing in such law, who control the Judiciary Committee of this House, should no longer delay action in this regard.

I submit that eight of the bills which my friend refers to, and criticizes the Congress of the United States for not passing, are in practical substance already the law, and the ninth one, concerning lynching, he would not vote for himself.

I make this statement solely in justice to the House of Representatives and for the purpose of correcting the very erroneous impression which the public would get from a reading of the gentleman's remarks.

I am sorry he made them, for I fear my statement will never overtake and obliterate the erroneous impressions.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition at this time——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how much longer this proceeding is going to continue to-night?

Mr. HELM. I understood the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY] had an hour, and was yielding portions of that time to gentlemen on that side. May I inquire how much of his hour is yet remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY] has 14 minutes remaining.

Mr. HELM. After the expiration of the 14 minutes I understand that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN], a member of the committee, desires time in the general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Georgia, who is a member of the committee, desires recognition, he is entitled to it.

Mr. LARSEN. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] was recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman was recognized.

Mr. ROBBINS. I was waiting until the conclusion of this colloquy.

Mr. LARSEN. I am a member of the committee, and after the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania I desire recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. LARSEN. How long a time will I be recognized for?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be recognized for one hour.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will not the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] be satisfied to proceed on Monday, or when we next consider this bill? We have not a corporal's guard here now?

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 29 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, June 24, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting communication from the Postmaster General submitting deficiency estimates of appropriation required by the Postal Service for the fiscal year 1918 (H. Doc. No. 1187); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting letter relating to the purchase of land by the Bureau of Standards in the District of Columbia (H. Doc. No. 1188); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. FLOOD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 158) further extending the time within which the joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River shall remain in effect, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 679), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. SHERWOOD, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (S. 4194) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 676), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 4543) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 677), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. FLOOD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 86) admitting Aurelio Collazo to the United States Military Academy, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 680), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BORLAND: A bill (H. R. 12541) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes; to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

By Mr. DAVILA: A bill (H. R. 12542) to increase the number of midshipmen at the United States Naval Academy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. SMITH of Idaho: A bill (H. R. 12543) to authorize the addition of certain lands to the Caribou National Forest; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CLAYPOOL: A bill (H. R. 12544) granting an increase of pension to Leva Raymond; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD: A bill (H. R. 12545) granting an increase of pension to Helen R. Cantwell; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. STERLING of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 12546) granting an increase of pension to Anna M. Fuller; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WELTY: A bill (H. R. 12547) granting a pension to Celestine Schaeffer; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12548) granting a pension to Sarah Isabell Lowe; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Resolutions of the Iowa State Manufacturers' Association, relative to the production and transportation of essentials, and asking that Government purchases be so distributed as to help solve problems mentioned; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also (by request), resolutions of the St. Joseph (Mo.) Federation of Women's Clubs and of the Livingston (Mont.) Rotary Club, favoring House bill 5407; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of D. C. Imboden, New York City, urging that a proclamation to get enemy soldiers to desert be scattered by airplane; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also (by request), petition of the representatives of the Farmers' Union, asking for the suspension of immigration laws during the war for the purpose of bringing in laborers; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also (by request), petition of Lee Wilson & Co., St. Louis, Mo., against House bill 11599; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also (by request), memorial of the Pittsburgh Clearing House Association, protesting against the passage of Senate bill 4426; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Also (by request), resolution adopted by a public meeting held under the auspices of the Boston Socialist Party, protesting against the possible invasion of Russian territory by Japan; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also (by request), petitions of the Missouri Federation of Women's Clubs; Woman's Home Missionary Society of Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church, Lincoln, Nebr.; Ministers' Union of the Lutheran Ministers of Chicago; the Mexico (Mo.) SENATE.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we call upon Thy name at the beginning of this session, asking for all those high and holy qualities of character that will fit us for the duties of this day. Thou hast taught us that righteousness exalteth a nation. Righteousness in the Army and in the citizenship and in places of influence and power exalteth a nation. We pray that the righteousness of the Lord our God may be ours, and that we may follow Thy will to accomplish Thy purpose among men. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last, when, on request of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. BECKHAM. My colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], is detained by illness.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] on account of illness. This announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

NONCOMBATANT OFFICERS (S. DOC. NO. 244).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of War, which was read:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 18, 1918.

SIR: On the 17th of June the Senate adopted a resolution directing the Secretary of War to furnish to the Senate, at the earliest possible day, the information called for in Senate resolution No. 220, agreed to on April 18, 1918, and transmitted to him on the following day.

The resolution referred to directs the Secretary of War to furnish to the Senate as soon possible a list of men to whom commissions in the Army have been issued and who are not now and who have heretofore been placed in command or had charge of troops of the United States, either here or abroad, and the branch of the service in which such men have been commissioned.

On the 21st day of May I wrote to the Hon. GEORGE A. CHAMBERLAIN, chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, in response to an inquiry as to when the report called for by Senate resolution No. 220 might be expected. I told him that steps had been immediately taken to obtain the information desired, but that it would not be possible to submit the report within less than three months of the date of the resolution, in view of the fact that every organization in the Army in France, the Philippine Islands, Hawaii, the Panama Canal Zone, and elsewhere had to be reached before the information desired could be furnished in approximately accurate form. Some of the information desired by the Senate is at hand, but it is by no means complete, and even when full returns have been received to the inquiries initiated it will require some time to tabulate and compile the information so that it will be useful to the Senate. It will give me great pleasure to transmit the information at the earliest possible day.

Respectfully,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Mr. NELSON. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation in the sum of $90,000, required by the Lighthouse Service for the lighthouse depot and equipment for the sixteenth lighthouse district, Alaska (S. Doc. No. 243), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an alternative estimate of appropriation in the sum of $7,590,239, required by the employment service of the Department of Labor for salaries and expenses for the fiscal year 1919 (S. Doc. No. 246), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation in the sum of $40,000, required by the National Park Service for construction of a new administration and Government free bathhouse building on the Hot Springs Reservation, Ark. (S. Doc. No. 245), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a letter from the corresponding secretary of the North Carolina Federation of Women's Clubs asking me to have printed in the RECORD the resolutions of that club in favor of woman suffrage. Under the rule I can not do so, and I simply make this statement in order that the ladies may know that I have stated to the Senate that they favor the woman suffrage amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I present a number of letters and telegrams from constituents in my State in favor of the constitutional amendment relating to woman suffrage. I do not ask that they shall even be noted in the RECORD, but that they may lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action will be taken.

Mr. BECKHAM. I have resolutions adopted by the Woman's Suffrage Association of Owensboro, Ky., on the subject of national prohibition. I ask to have printed in the RECORD so much as under the rule can be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is impossible to hear on account of the conversation going on in the Chamber. I could not gather the request of the Senator from Kentucky.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's request was to comply with the rule.

Mr. BECKHAM presented resolutions adopted by the Interdenominational Ministerial Association of Owensboro, Ky., favoring national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CUMMINS. I present a resolution adopted by the Iowa Federation of Labor in convention at Mason City June 12, praying the Senate to speedily and favorably dispose of the pending Federal suffrage amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will lie on the table.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have received a letter from the North Carolina Federation of Women's Clubs, signed by Mrs. W. Thomas Bost, corresponding secretary, with the request that I read the letter into the RECORD. Therefore, in compliance with the request, I shall read it. It is as follows:

THE NORTH CAROLINA FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S CLUBS,
Raleigh, N. C., June 18, 1918.

Senator F. M. SIMMONS,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SIMMONS: At the recent annual convention of the North Carolina Federation of Women's Clubs the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That we, the North Carolina Federation of Women's Clubs, put ourselves on record in favor of the enfranchisement of women."

I am requested to ask you to kindly read the resolution into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Our State federation is composed of 160 clubs, which number about 7,500 of the most representative women of North Carolina.

Thanking you in advance for your kindness, I am,
Most sincerely, yours,

MRS. W. THOMAS BOST,
Corresponding Secretary.

Mr. WARREN presented a petition of Capitol Vista Grange, No. 39, Patrons of Husbandry, of Cheyenne, Wyo., praying for the repeal of the present zone system of postage rates on second-class mail matter, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Niobrara, Bighorn, and Natrona Counties, all in the State of Wyoming; of the State Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Wyoming; and of sundry citizens of Wyoming, praying for the enactment of further prohibition legislation as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE presented a resolution adopted by the City Council of Malden, Mass., favoring the proposed new revenue legislation, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying for the immediate submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Clearing House Association of Springfield, Mass., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation guaranteeing certain bank deposits, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from sundry members of the Sunday school of the First Methodist Church of Attleboro, Mass., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PHELAN presented resolutions adopted by the Humboldt Chamber of Commerce, of Eureka, Cal., favoring the surveying of military highways on the Pacific coast, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Liberty League, of Galt, Cal., favoring the elimination of strikes by compulsory arbitration, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. COLT presented a petition of the Rhode Island Equal Suffrage Association, praying for the immediate submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MARTIN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 12441) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 521) thereon.

As soon as the routine morning business is over I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I report back favorably with amendments from the Committee on Military Affairs the bill (H. R. 12281) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and I submit a report (No. 520) thereon.

Immediately after the completion of the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill I shall ask the permission of the Senate to take up this bill.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 4225) for the relief of the Atlas Lumber Co., Babcock & Willcox, Johnson, Jackson & Corning Co., and the C. H. Klein Brick Co., each of which companies furnished to Silas N. Opdahl, a failing Government contractor, certain building materials which were used in the construction of Burke Hall, at the Pierre Indian School, in the State of South Dakota, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 522) thereon.

Mr. OVERMAN. With the consent of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], who introduced the bill (S. 4724) to incorporate the Mothers of Democracy of the United States of America, I move that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. OVERMAN:

A bill (S. 4739) to fix the annual salary of the collector of customs for the district of North Carolina (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (S. 4740) to authorize the Supreme Court to prescribe forms and rules and generally to regulate pleading, procedure, and practice on the common-law side of the Federal courts; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McCUMBER:

A bill (S. 4741) granting an increase of pension to Jacob B. Eakman (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 4742) for the relief of the Yosemite Stone Co.; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. FALL:

A bill (S. 4743) for the relief of Francis Stewart (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. WARREN:

A bill (S. 4744) granting an increase of pension to Dennis Driscoll (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. HOLLIS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,200 to pay Dennis M. Kerr for extra and expert services rendered to the Committee on Pensions during the first and second sessions of the Sixty-fifth Congress, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OWEN submitted an amendment relative to the payment of the judgment of the Court of Claims of May 18, 1905, in favor of the Cherokee Nation with interest, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ASHURST submitted an amendment providing that the pay of all printers, printer-linotype operators, printer-monotype keyboard operators, etc., employed in the Government Printing Office shall be at the rate of 70 cents per hour for the time actually employed, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. KENDRICK submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 for the continuation of investigation and survey of the High Line Canal, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 for the investigation and survey of an irrigation system in the Green River watershed, Wyoming, and also proposing to appropriate $10,000 for the investigation and survey of the Wiley project, Wyoming, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

Mr. NORRIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA RENT ADMINISTRATOR.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate to present the following resolution and to ask for its immediate consideration. I ask that it may be read for the information of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 266) was read, as follows:

Whereas H. R. 9248, a bill "to prevent extortion, to impose taxes upon certain incomes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," duly passed by the House of Representatives March 12, 1918, was considered in the Senate and passed with a reported amendment in the nature of a substitute May 11, 1918; and

Whereas on said May 11, 1918, a conference was asked and managers on the part of the Senate were appointed thereon; and

Whereas on June 14, 1918, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the House of Representatives called said bill from the Speaker's table, and made thereon certain remarks seriously reflecting upon the honor and integrity of the Senate, as appears on pages 7808 to 7812 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and

Whereas subsequently, on said June 14, 1918, managers were appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, of whom said chairman of said committee was one; and

Whereas said chairman of said House committee subsequently sent to each manager on the part of the Senate, under date of June 19, 1918, the following letter:

"COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
"UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
"Washington, D. C., June 19, 1918.

"DEAR SIR: I write to advise you that on the 14th instant the House agreed to the request made by the Senate for a conference on H. R. 9248—the antiprofiteering rent bill—and that Messrs. CROSSER, of Ohio, CARY, of Wisconsin, and myself were appointed conferees on the part of the House; and, further, to advise you that we will meet the Senate conferees at such time and place that will be most agreeable to the Senate conferees.

"In order to facilitate matters I am inviting the attention of each of the Senate conferees to some of the more important questions of difference which will arise in conference by sending in advance a list of questions inquiring as to the attitude of the Senate conferees concerning each. The questions mentioned are herewith inclosed.

"Very truly, yours,

"BEN JOHNSON.

"1. Are you unalterable in your purpose to create a rent administrator?

"2. If so, are you unalterable in your purpose not to intrust the work with anyone unless he be a resident of the District of Columbia?

"3. Are you unalterable in your purpose not to permit the President to select a rent administrator for the District of Columbia, just as he selected a food administrator and fuel administrator, i. e., without your consent and approval?

"4. Are you unalterable in your seeming purpose to permit profiteering in house rents by imposing a fine less than the amount of the profiteering, or will you accept some plan like that recently suggested by the President in his message to Congress, whereby all the money taken in a profiteering transaction shall be surrendered?

"5. Are you unalterable in your adherence to that part of the Senate bill which would compel the tenant to leave his work as often and as long as it would be necessary for him to leave it in order to prosecute or defend the several appeals allowed?

"6. Are you unalterable in your purpose not to fix a gross return to the landlord; but, instead, to give him a 'net' return, notwithstanding the fact that thereby the landlord would have no interest whatever in keeping down the operating expenses of the premises?

"7. Are you unalterable in your purpose to saddle upon the tenant the cost of permanent street and similar improvements to the real estate alone, notwithstanding the fact that the erstwhile tenant enjoys the building alone?

"8. Are you unalterable in your purpose to compel the tenant to account for 'vacancies' in house and 'depreciation' of the house, and not allow him to offset that by the growing increase in the value of the land upon which the house stands?

"9. Are you unalterable in your purpose to permit a landlord to profiteer with a business house because it may once have been used as a residence?

"10. Are you unalterable in your purpose to fasten the present annual rates of rental on the tenant by fixing the rates in effect on the 1st day of last October as a basis?

"11. Are you unalterable in your purpose that the rental for furniture shall be as much as 30 per cent of its value?

"12. Are you unalterable in your seeming purpose not to punish profiteering corporations to the same extent that you would individuals who profiteer?

"13. Are you unalterable in your seeming purpose to exempt 'the original landlord' from all the provisions of the bill by your definition of 'landlord'?

"14. If you are unalterable in your seeming purpose to adhere to the remedy of 'fine' instead of that of 'taxation,' as set out in the bill passed by the House, would you be in favor of having a fine levied on all those who violate any provision of the act, or would you insist upon limiting it to those only who 'evade or attempt to evade its provisions'?"

And

Whereas on June 21, 1918, said chairman of said House committee sent to each of the managers on the part of the Senate the following letter:

"COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
"UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
"Washington, D. C., June 21, 1918.

"To the SENATE CONFEREES ON H. R. 9248,
THE ANTIPROFITEERING RENT BILL,

"GENTLEMEN: The Washington newspapers of yesterday contained the statement that at least some of the Senate conferees on the antiprofiteering rent bill contemplated having me denied the privileges of the Senate floor because of the criticism made by me of the Senate amendment, which has come to be known as the 'Pomerene bill.'

"I do not care a continental about that; run along and get through with it, and then permit the Senate to vote on a measure that will prevent the profiteers from driving nearly a thousand war workers out of Washington every week. I am not interested in the least in your undertaking to deny me the privileges of the Senate Chamber, but I am deeply concerned for the war worker, who is being robbed and then sent out of Washington, and because of which our boys in France must suffer.

"The newspaper articles referred to state also that at least some of the Senate conferees may decline to go into conference because I am one of the House conferees. May I not suggest that by such a course, either intentionally or unintentionally, you play right into the hands of the profiteers, as delay in the passage of a good bill is what they seek?

"May I not also suggest that your skins should be thicker or your bill better? I not only invite the severest criticism of all my official acts, but I am quite anxious, indeed, to have the acid test applied to my endeavors in this particular matter; and you will not only not offend me, but you will do me a favor by wading into both me and it without gloves, since I, and not the landlords, am its author.

"This is not a time for 'senatorial dignity,' but one for action. Rearing back on your 'pastern joints' don't get the oppressed tenants anything. I do not intend to permit your attitude toward me, because of my criticism of your 'rotten' bill, to in the least deter me in my efforts to prevent the profiteer from fattening off of your country's needs.

"Your amendment—the Pomerene bill—had to be criticized, 'senatorial dignity' to the contrary notwithstanding.

"My contempt for such of you as may resort to pretext to evade full responsibility for not giving our war workers protection from the miserable profiteers is just as great as yours may be for me; but, as I said, that shall not stop me from following my plain duty in the premises.

"Let us get to work on the bill, and then you can have your revenge on me to your hearts' content. You have my full consent to deny me the privileges of the Senate Chamber or even to take your spite out of my hide if you will only go ahead and let the Senate vote on a good bill instead of a subterfuge.

"While I am sending this letter to each of the conferees, it is really intended for those only who are responsible for the article in yesterday afternoon's local newspapers.

"Very truly, yours,

"BEN JOHNSON."

And

Whereas on June 22, 1918, the said chairman of said House committee presented the foregoing letters to the House of Representatives and in presenting them used the following language:

"I take it for granted that the thought of 'ousting' me from the Senate Chamber is the result of a close association with those who have been 'ousting' the Government workers from houses in the District of Columbia":

Therefore be it

Resolved, That the conferees on the part of the Senate on said bill be, and they are hereby, excused from further service as such conferees until otherwise ordered by the Senate, and that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to transmit a copy of this resolution to the House of Representatives.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of this resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the District Committee by unanimous vote directed me to present the preamble and resolution just read. I ask for its present consideration. Senators are familiar with the fact that a so-called rent profiteering bill was passed by the House, came to the Senate, was referred to the District Committee, and by the District Committee referred to a subcommittee consisting of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], and myself. The Senate passed the bill on May 11, and on that day asked for a conference. The House did not agree to that conference until June 14, more than a month after we had asked for the conference.

I think I ought to give very briefly a history of this bill so far as the Senate is connected with it. The subcommittee to which I have referred held quite extensive hearings upon the bill. After those hearings we went into executive session. The committee considered the subject very fully during several sittings and having agreed upon the fundamental principles of the bill asked me to prepare a bill and to present it to them for further consideration. This I did, trying to follow out their suggestions, and perhaps incorporating in the bill such further principles as a further and fuller study brought to my attention.

I am not in the habit of taking offense because Senators or Representatives differ from me. I assume for myself honesty of purpose, and I am always willing to accord that same state of mind to my fellow Senators or Members of the other House. The Senate conferees ever since their appointment have been quite anxious and willing that a conference should be had with the hope that the difference between the two Houses might be fully and fairly discussed and that we might be able to agree upon a report to be presented to the two Houses for their final action.

On June 14 a Member of the other House called this bill from the Speaker's table, and in the course of his remarks referred to a circular which is said to have been sent out by a member of a local real estate association to the members of that association, asking that they should attend a national meeting of real estate men to be held, I believe, in St. Louis. One paragraph of that letter—and it was quoted by the Member of the other House—read as follows:

> Are you going to the St. Louis convention? Well, you should go. Why? Because the national association has gone out of its way and spent considerable money to help us in our local fight in Congress.

Then the Member of the House, quoting this circular, spoke as follows:

> The landlords asked for a rent administrator. They got it in the Pomerene bill. The landlords then asked that the rent administrator be a resident of the District of Columbia, and they got it in the Pomerene bill. Mr. Worthington says that the national association "spent considerable money to help us in the local fight in Congress." Then the Pomerene bill goes further and provides that the rent administrator shall be confirmed by the Senate. Mr. Worthington says that the national association has "spent considerable money to help us win our local fight in Congress."

I shall not take the time of Senators to read the remainder of this speech, but if Senators will take the time to read it they will discover that there is one innuendo after another throughout the entire speech, suggesting, if not charging, corruption on the part of Senators who favored this form of legislation.

Senators have just heard read the two communications which were sent by this Member of the House to members of the conference committee on the part of the Senate. I shall not take time to refer to them further, except to say that they are not such communications as one gentleman would send to other gentlemen.

If I may suggest further with regard to the rent administrator—and I am not going to take the time to discuss the merits of these two bills—it is true that the Senate saw fit to adopt the suggestions of the District Committee recommending the appointment of an administrator. We thought then, and I feel now, that it is necessary to have somebody to administer this bill if it shall finally become a law. The bill which passed the House also provides for a rent administrator, though he is not so called. The tax assessor is therein clothed with certain duties to perform, which are the duties which will be incumbent upon the rent administrator if the Senate amendment is adopted and one is appointed.

Now, I want to allude very briefly to another suggestion. It is said in the course of this speech that this bill was dictated by the real estate agents of this city. Allow me to suggest that it is true that the real estate agents presented a bill, which is incorporated in the hearings of the committee, providing for a rent administrator, but their bill gave to the rent administrator the full power to fix the amount of rents without limit. After some hearings they presented a second bill, which I have on my desk, and which placed limitations upon rents. The limitations, as I now recall, were that they should not be less than 7 per cent net or more than 12 per cent net. In the preparation of the bill which we presented we adopted 7 per cent, the minimum suggested by the real estate agents, as the maximum rent which could be collected by real estate owners.

Mr. President, the House adopted one plan. After it had been carefully canvassed by the subcommittee we came to the conclusion that it was unworkable. The bill as we finally prepared it provides for a rent administrator, and it is framed more or less after the style of similar legislation adopted in Great Britain, South Wales, and New Zealand.

I shall not take further the time of the Senate to discuss the merits of that bill; but the immediate question which presents itself to the Senate is this, Shall we pass by unheeded statements which are made reflecting upon the honor and the integrity of Senators? Can we meet for a full and free conference with Members of the other House when one of the conferees named by the other House has seen fit to write the letters which have been read here in your hearing this morning and has made the speech in the House to which the resolution refers?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President.——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Waiving the character of the letters, I will ask the Senator if he ever knew in his experience an instance where a member of the conferees of one House, before holding a conference, addressed a letter to the conferees of the other House interrogating them as to what action they proposed to take?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have been a Member of this body for seven years. The Senator who has just addressed me has been here for many, many years. I never heard of such a course of procedure; and my belief is, from the question which has been asked me, that the Senator from New Hampshire, who is perhaps longer in service than any other Member in the Senate, has never heard of that method of procedure.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will say that I never have heard of a similar procedure, and I hope I never may hear of it again.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that the Senator's resolution is to relieve the Senate conferees from acting further with the conferees of the House. What I want to ask is: In this unfortunate situation what is to become of this legislation?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho perhaps has overlooked the phraseology of the resolution?

Mr. BORAH. I may have done so. I only heard it read from the desk.

Mr. POMERENE. It reads thus:

> That the conferees on the part of the Senate on said bill be, and they are hereby, excused from further service as such conferees until otherwise ordered by the Senate.

Then follows this language:

> And that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to transmit a copy of this resolution to the House of Representatives.

Mr. BORAH. What will be the effect of this proceeding upon the legislation? It will have a tendency, perhaps, to kill it entirely, will it not?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not believe so. I hope not. I think the situation is such here in the District that the legislation ought to be passed. I do not believe that we shall fail to get an agreement when we meet with gentlemen.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me, Mr. President, that this matter is up to the House; that is to say, that the House ought to deal with the matter itself. In other words, unless the House takes action, it seems to me the proposed legislation will simply lie here and the matter will not ripen into any statute at all.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not take—if I may use the word—as pessimistic a view of this situation as the Senator from Idaho seems to take, if I may judge properly from his language.

Mr. BORAH. I judge of the situation by the past and by the present condition of affairs. This legislation has been in the process of passing now for about two months. I am not at all defending the course of procedure of anyone outside of this Chamber, and I have entire confidence in those who represent the Senate in the matter; but I simply wanted to know, as a matter of practical legislation, where we might expect to land with reference to this legislation, and when in all probability under this condition of affairs we might expect any legislation to be consummated.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator's question is quite pertinent and worthy of consideration, and has, I may say, been considered. It will be observed that the conferees are retained. We are calling these matters to the attention of the House, and I have such a very high regard for the House, taken as a whole, and for its membership that I do not believe they will allow this matter to pass unnoticed. I think I am not overstating the question when I say that if any gentleman who is a Member of either House has any knowledge of any corruption on the part of any Member of either House he has the right to present a resolution and ask for an investigation, and no gentleman will make any insinuation of corruption against any Member of the Congress unless he has the evidence to support that charge.

Mr. President, I do not think I care to say anything further at this time. The matter is before the Senate for the Senate's action. I do not feel, and the managers on the part of the Senate do not feel, that they can have a full and free conference with some one sitting on the other side of the table who pretends to believe that the conferees on the part of the Senate have been guilty of certain misconduct; and I do not believe that Senators expect those conferees to meet with a conferee who so far forgets all the amenities which should exist between gentlemen as to make the charges and insinuations which are contained in his speech and in the communications which were sent to the managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if I may ask the Senator from Ohio a question, having in mind only the parliamentary situation that will exist and the very great danger of nonaction, I want to ask the Senator whether action would not be more certain if the resolution discharged these conferees and asked for a new conference? The parliamentary situation in the House then would have been to concur in that action and to appoint new conferees.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have very great respect for the opinion of the Senator from Wisconsin. That is a matter which Senators must determine for themselves. We felt, in our discussion of this matter in the full committee, that perhaps this was the wiser course to pursue. It may be that the Senator from Wisconsin is right. As to that matter, I defer to the wisdom of the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. I take it, Mr. President, that that is a motion that would come up later.

Mr. POMERENE. I think it could come up later.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has covered the matter; but I wish to say, largely in response to the proper parliamentary inquiry made by the Senator from Wisconsin, that it would be the duty of the Chair in that event to name conferees who voted against the bill. There were some who voted against the bill, who were not convinced of the constitutionality or the propriety of such legislation; but the reflection, if it be a reflection, in the matter referred to by the Senator from Ohio is one that goes directly against every Senator who supported this bill, either on a roll call in this Chamber or who had a part in the committee or subcommittee in framing and reporting the bill and supporting it in the committee. So that it would present the anomalous parliamentary situation of requiring the Chair to appoint conferees on behalf of this body who are opposed to the bill, if you put on the conference committee persons who could meet the conferees already named by the House and who would be free from the insinuations or charges which seem to be made in the address contained in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 14. So that it would leave the matter in a most peculiar condition in naming conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber at the time the resolution was read, and I should like to have it read from the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the conferees on the part of the Senate on said bill be, and they are hereby, excused from further service as such conferees until otherwise ordered by the Senate, and that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to transmit a copy of this resolution to the House of Representatives.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. After this resolution is adopted, if it is adopted, will the procedure which was suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin be in order at any time, if anyone desires to make that motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of that opinion—that at any time the Senate chose to do so it could discharge the present conferees and appoint others.

Mr. BORAH. I ask the question for the reason that it seems to me that unless some procedure of that kind is open, in all probability this matter will stand without action interminably.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the resolution is unanimously adopted.

ALLIANCE WITH THE GOVERNMENT OF COSTA RICA.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I submit a resolution, which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The resolution (S. Res. 267) was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Whereas the Government of Costa Rica did, on a timely date, succeeding the declaration of war by the Congress of the United States against the Imperial Government of Germany, extend to our Government words of sympathy and offers of substantial aid in the common defense of American rights in the manner following, to wit:

"THE ARLINGTON,
"Washington, D. C., April 9, 1917.

"MR. SECRETARY: The United States having declared that a state of war exists with the Imperial German Government, my Government has instructed me to reiterate to your excellency the assurances of Costa Rica's most loyal and sincere friendship for the United States.

"The Costa Rican Government considers that it is the duty of all American Republics to support, at least morally, the noble attitude assumed by the United States in defense of the highest ideals of law, of right and justice, and of democracy.

"The Republic of Costa Rica regrets that, because of its lack of material strength, it can not in this crisis tender to the United States more substantial cooperation; but if it might be permitted to demonstrate its solidarity with the Government and people of its great sister Republic of the North in such manner, for instance, as by permitting the use of its waters and ports for war needs by the American Navy that form of cooperation would be undertaken with the greatest satisfaction.

"With great pleasure, I reiterate to your excellency the assurances of my highest esteem, and beg to remain,

"Your excellency's most obedient servant,

"R. FERNANDEZ GUARDIA.

"HIS EXCELLENCY, ROBERT LANSING,
"Secretary of State of the United States, Washington."

And

Whereas this expression of good will on the part of the Government of Costa Rica provoked the enmity of the German Government, which culminated in the severance of diplomatic relations with that Government by the Government of Costa Rica on the 21st day of September, 1917; and

Whereas the Government of Costa Rica, for reasons of her own did, on the 23d day of May, 1918, by an act of Congress, declare the Government of Costa Rica to be in a state of war with the Government of Germany, thus taking her place in the battle line for the defense of American interests as well as her own: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the imperative duty of the Government of the United States to recognize the advantage of this alliance with the Government of Costa Rica in the war with Germany, and as a measure of national prudence to take favorable consideration of the immediate acceptance of the pending offer of the Government of Costa Rica to the Government of the United States of the use of their ports and waters in common with themselves in the existing war, as a safeguard and means of protection to the imperiled American interests in the Panama Canal Zone and Central America, and to cooperate with the Government of Costa Rica, as with our European allies, in the common defense and in the prosecution of the war against the common enemy of mankind.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR HENDERSON (S. DOC. NO. 242).

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a patriotic address delivered by the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] at the prize-day exercises at Pomfret (Conn.) public school, on June 21, be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. TILLMAN. I present the conference report on House bill 10854, the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I assume that it will lie over and be printed.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator wishes it to lie over, all right.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10854) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 14, 15, 26, 40, 90, 103, 104, 153, and 172.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 16, 17, 19, 21, 22, 24, 25, 28, 29, 32, 36, 43, 44, 45, 46, 48, 49, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 64, 67, 70, 71, 73, 76, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 89, 91, 92, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 113, 114, 116, 118, 119, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 154, 155, 157, 158, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, and 171; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"The Secretary of the Navy is authorized in leasing waterfront property from any State or municipality where the State law or charter of the municipality requires that the improvements placed upon leased lands shall at the termination of the lease become the property of the State or municipality, to provide, as a part or all of the consideration therefor, that improvements placed thereon by the United States shall become the property of the lessor upon the expiration of the lease or any renewal thereof."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of said amendment, after the word "Secretary," insert the following: "of the Navy"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "to aid" in said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert after the word "employees" in said amendment the following: "who render conspicuous service by putting their life in jeopardy to save life or property"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 20, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert before the words "the President" the word "and"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert after the word "accepted" in said amendment the word "temporary"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 30, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert before the words "Marine Corps Reserve" the word "or," and strike out "or United States Army"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: Strike out the word "purchase" in said amendment, and in lieu thereof insert the word "acquisition"; and after the word "land" in said amendment insert the following: "upon which such armories may be located"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That hereafter, during the existence of war or of a national emergency declared by the President to exist, any commissioned or warrant officer of the Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard of the United States on the retired list may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, be ordered to active duty at sea or on shore; and any retired officer performing such active duty in time of war or national emergency, declared as aforesaid, shall be entitled to promotion on the retired list to the grade or rank, not above that of lieutenant commander in the Navy or major in the Marine Corps or captain in the Coast Guard, and shall thereafter receive the pay and allowances thereof, which his total active service as an officer both prior and subsequent to retirement, in the manner rendered by him, would have enabled him to attain in due course of promotion had such service been rendered continuously on the active list during the period of time last past.

"That during the existence of war or of a national emergency, declared as aforesaid, any commissioned or warrant officer of the Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard of the United States on the retired list, while on active duty, may be temporarily advanced to and commissioned in such higher grade or rank on the retired list, not above that of lieutenant commander in the Navy or major in the Marine Corps or captain in the Coast Guard, as the President may determine, and any officer so advanced shall, while on active duty, be entitled to the same pay and allowances as officers of like grade or rank on the active list: Provided, That any such commissioned or warrant officer who have been so temporarily advanced in grade or rank shall, upon his relief from active duty, or in any case not later than six months after the termination of the war or of the national emergency, declared as aforesaid, revert to the grade or rank on the retired list and to the pay and allowance status which he would have held had he not been so temporarily advanced: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall operate to reduce the pay and allowances now allowed by law to retired officers."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 51, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 12 of said amendment, after the words "specifically designated," insert the following: "during war or national emergency declared by the President"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 54, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of said amendment, after the word "concerned," add the following: "and promotions shall be made on the basis of fitness alone by selection from among the officers of the rank next below: Provided further, That the requirements for sea service in grade, length of service in grade, and maximum age in grade for promotion shall not apply"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 63 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out, in said amendment, "$105,014,110.50," and in lieu thereof insert "$85,014,110.50," and add the following proviso:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise to incur obligations for the purposes above mentioned not to exceed $20,000,000 in addition to the appropriations herein and heretofore made."

In line 14, page 39, of the act (H. R. 10854) as it passed the House April 20, 1918, after the word "Provided," insert the word "further."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 65, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Before the words "March twenty-eighth" insert the words "the act of"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 66, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$84,289,530" and insert "$73,289,530," and add the following proviso:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise to incur obligations for the purposes above mentioned not to exceed $11,000,000 in addition to the appropriations herein and heretofore made."

In line 19, page 39, of the act (H. R. 10854) as it passed the House April 20, 1918, after the word "Provided," insert the word "further."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 68, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Before the words "March 28" insert the words "the act of"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 69, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$11,000,000," and insert in lieu thereof "$10,000,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 72, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Before the words "March 28," insert the words "the act of"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 74, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3 of said amendment, after the word "selected," insert the words "and acquired"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 77, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language stricken out by the Senate insert the following:

"Provided further, That no part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used for the purchase of more than 115 passenger-carrying automobiles for official use within the United States and its insular possessions: And provided further, That no part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used for the purchase of more than 100 such passenger-carrying automobiles at a greater cost than $500 each and 15 at a greater cost than $2,000 each. And provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to distribute the high-powered automobiles now owned and in use in the United States and its insular possessions to such places and service as they may be required."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 86, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$2,500,000" and in lieu thereof insert: "$1,000,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise to incur obligations for this purpose not to exceed $1,500,000 in addition to the appropriation herein made"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 87, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$4,805,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,305,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 88, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Before the word "officers" insert the word "medical"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 111, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$4,500,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$4,000,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 117, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 4 of said amendment strike out the following: "to Seward, Alaska"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 156, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$93,753,682" and insert in lieu thereof "$93,203,682"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 159, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$160,566,756.14" and insert in lieu thereof "$160,016,756.14"; and the Senate agree to the same.

On amendments of the Senate numbered 4, 5, 23, 33, 34, 35, 37, 38, 39, 41, 42, 47, 52, 53, 75, 93, 100, 101, 102, 112, 115, 120, and 170 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

B. R. TILLMAN,
CLAUDE A. SWANSON,
H. C. LODGE,
BOIES PENROSE,
By H. C. L.,
JOHN WALTER SMITH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

L. P. PADGETT,
J. FRED. C. TALBOTT,
D. J. RIORDAN,
THOMAS S. BUTLER,
WM. J. BROWNING,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is not a full report. Unless the Senator from New Hampshire insists upon it I want the Senate to agree to the conference report and to order a further conference.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is quite agreeable to me. I did not quite understand the status of the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments still in disagreement between the two Houses, and ask for a further conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. TILLMAN, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. PENROSE, and Mr. LODGE managers at the further conference on the part of the Senate.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I submit a conference report on the bill (H. R. 7237) known as the Post Office appropriation bill, which I ask may lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment numbered 23 of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7237) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the amendment proposed by the Senate and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"For the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices $665,000: Provided, That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to extend existing contracts for pneumatic-tube service until March 4, 1919, and the Postmaster General is directed to expend this appropriation for the sole purpose of continuing the existing pneumatic mail tube service, and no part thereof shall be expended for the transportation of mails in any other manner than herein authorized: Provided further, That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby authorized and directed to investigate and report to Congress not later than the 1st day of December, 1918, (1) whether or not the present pneumatic mail tube service in the cities of New York, N. Y., Brooklyn, N. Y., Boston, Mass., Philadelphia, Pa., Chicago, Ill., and St. Louis, Mo., is a valuable and efficient postal facility, whether or not it expedites the delivery of first-class mail and should be retained or discontinued; (2) to investigate and report whether or not the present pneumatic-tube mail system is suited for the purpose of expediting the delivery of first-class mail, or whether tubes of a different kind or size should be employed; (3) if the said commission should recommend the retention of the present system, should the properties be purchased or leased by the Government, and at what price and upon what terms; (4) if said commission should recommend a rental, as at present operated, what compensation should be paid therefor: Provided further, That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall permit hearings to all parties at interest and the expenses for such investigation shall be paid out of any available funds appropriated for the use of the Interstate Commerce Commission."

And the House agree to the same.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 12099. An act to confer on the President power to prescribe charter rates and freight rates and to requisition vessels, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

H. R. 12402. An act to exclude and expel from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 12441, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12441) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Department of State," on page 2, after line 8, to insert:

Post allowances to consular and diplomatic officers: The appropriations for post allowances to consular and diplomatic officers for the fiscal year 1919 are made available for payment to consular and diplomatic officers regardless of where stationed and to the officers of the United States Court for China.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Treasury Department," on page 4, after line 6, to insert:

Honolulu, Hawaii, post office, courthouse, and customhouse: For continuation, $150,000.

Paris, Tex., post office and courthouse: For completion, $70,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 22, to insert:

Washington, D. C., Bureau of Engraving and Printing: For additional boilers to operate the laundry at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and for an incinerator for use in disposing of sweepings, oil rags, etc., from said bureau, and for a special incinerator for the destruction of nondistinctive paper used for stamps, etc., and for a building to house the foregoing, and also for installing a ventilating apparatus in the present laundry building, $68,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Marine hospitals," on page 6, after line 19, to insert:

Cincinnati, Ohio: Additional for repairs to old marine hospital and grounds, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 23, to strike out:

Mobile, Ala.: For a passenger elevator, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 7, to insert:

Mobile, Ala.: For passenger elevator and refrigerating plant, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Quarantine stations," on page 7, after line 5, to insert:

Cape Charles, Va.: For seven barracks buildings, three mess halls, officers' quarters, remodeling building for attendants' quarters, heating plant and plumbing, lighting plant and equipment, disinfection building and equipment, laundry building and equipment, sewage, drainage and approach work, hospital building and equipment, disinfecting and boarding vessel, miscellaneous furnishing and equipment, and for remodeling existing buildings, $151,500, and the appropriations made in the urgent deficiency act approved October 6, 1917, for the Cape Charles Quarantine Station are made available for the purposes herein named.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 24, after the word "fencing," to strike out "$600" and insert "$1,000," so as to make the clause read:

Port Townsend, Wash.: For wire fencing, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 1, to insert:

For two barracks buildings and laboratory space; crematory; attendants' quarters; officers' quarters; and laundry equipment; and miscellaneous furnishing and equipment, Reedy Island Quarantine Station, $61,500, and the appropriations made in the sundry civil appropriation act approved June 23, 1913, and the urgent deficiency appropriation act approved October 6, 1917, for the Reedy Island Quarantine Station are made available for the purposes herein named.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 11, to insert:

Savannah, Ga.: For four barracks buildings, two mess halls, hospital building, attendants' quarters, heating and plumbing, lighting, sewage and water, laundry and equipment, and for miscellaneous furnishing and equipment, $26,000, and the appropriations made in the urgent deficiency appropriation act approved October 6, 1917, for the Savannah, Ga., Quarantine Station are made available for the purposes herein named.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Coast Guard," on page 19, line 7, after the word "cadets," to insert "and warrant officers"; and, in line 10, after the word "midshipmen," to insert "and warrant officers"; so as to make the clause read:

For pay and allowances prescribed by law for commissioned officers, warrant officers, petty officers, and other enlisted men, active and retired, temporary and substitute surfmen, cadets and cadet engineers, and one civilian instructor, $5,124,835: Provided, That a civilian instructor in the Coast Guard, after five years' service as such, shall have the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant, and after 10 years of such service shall have the pay and allowances of a first lieutenant in the Coast Guard: Provided further, That cadets and warrant officers in the Coast Guard shall receive the same pay and allowances as are now or may hereafter be provided by law for midshipmen and warrant officers in the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Engraving and Printing," on page 21, line 16, after the word "assistants," to strike out "$1,731,600" and insert "$2,039,118"; so as to read:

For salaries of all necessary employees, other than employees required for the administrative work of the bureau of the class provided for and specified in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, and plate printers and plate printers' assistants, $2,039,118, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 6, after the word "employed," to strike out "$1,930,000" and insert "$2,100,600"; so as to make the clause read:

For wages of plate printers, at piece rates to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, not to exceed the rates usually paid for such work, including the wages of printers' assistants, when employed, $2,100,600, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Customs Service," on page 28, line 11, after the word "revenue," to strike out "$10,200,000" and insert "$10,900,000"; so as to make the clause read:

For collecting the revenue from customs, including not exceeding $200,000 for the detection and prevention of frauds upon the customs revenue, $10,900,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to page 41, line 16.

Mr. WATSON. I notice in the reading of the bill page 34 was passed over, the items for the Committee on Public Information.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The total was read.

Mr. WATSON. I was engaged in conversation and did not notice. I wish to make a motion with reference to that appropriation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We are merely considering committee amendments in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement. After the amendments of the committee have been considered, the Senator from Indiana can, of course, move any amendment he pleases.

Mr. WATSON. That is, after the reading of the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. After the committee amendments have been reached and agreed to or disagreed to, then the bill is open to amendment by individual Senators.

Mr. WATSON. Very well.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Interstate Commerce Commission," on page 41, line 16, after the date "1914," to strike out "$250,000" and insert "$313,000," so as to make the clause read:

To enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to keep informed regarding and to enforce compliance with acts to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads; the act requiring common carriers to make reports of accidents and authorizing investigations thereof; and to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate and test block-signal and train-control systems and appliances intended to promote the safety of railway operation, as authorized by the joint resolution approved June 30, 1906, and the provision of the sundry civil act approved May 27, 1908, including the employment of inspectors, and per diem in lieu of subsistence when allowed pursuant to section 13 of the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 1, 1914, $313,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics," on page 43, line 15, after "$200,000," to insert "of which sum $10,300 shall be available for printing and binding the bibliography of aeronautics from July 1, 1909, to December 31, 1916"; and in line 21, after the word "buildings," to strike out "occupied by the Signal Corps," so as to make the clause read:

For scientific research, technical investigations, and special reports in the field of aeronautics, including the necessary laboratory and technical assistants; traveling expenses of members and employees; office supplies, printing, and other miscellaneous expenses; equipment, maintenance, and operation of research laboratory, and construction of additional buildings necessary in connection therewith; personal services in the field and in the District of Columbia: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation for clerical, drafting, watchmen, and messenger service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, shall not exceed $43,000; in all, $200,000, of which sum $10,300 shall be available for printing and binding the bibliography of aeronautics from July 1, 1909, to December 31, 1916: Provided, That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to furnish office space to the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics in governmental buildings.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Emergency Shipping Fund," on page 46, line 4, after the word "shipbuilding," to insert "or ship maintenance or repair," so as to make the clause read:

For the acquisition or establishment of plants suitable for shipbuilding or ship maintenance or repair, or of materials essential thereto, and for the enlargement or extension of such plants as are now or may be hereafter acquired or established, $87,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, line 18, after the date "1918," to strike out "$50,000,000" and insert "$75,000,000," so as to make the clause read:

For carrying out the act entitled "An act to authorize and empower the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to purchase, lease, requisition, or otherwise acquire, and to sell or otherwise dispose of improved or unimproved land, houses, buildings, and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1918, $75,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, after line 18, to insert:

For carrying out the act entitled "An act to amend the emergency shipping fund provisions of the urgent deficiency appropriation act approved June 15, 1917, so as to empower the President and his designated agents to take over certain transportation systems for the transportation of shipyard and plant employees, and for other purposes," approved April 22, 1918, $20,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Quartermaster Corps," in the item of appropriation for the disposition of remains of officers, soldiers, civilian employees, etc., on page 61, line 12, after "$250,000," to insert:

Provided, That during the continuance of the present war the above provisions shall be applicable in the cases of officers and enlisted men on the retired list of the Army who have died or may hereafter die while on active duty by proper assignment.

So as to read:

Interment of military prisoners who die at military posts; removal of remains from abandoned posts to permanent military posts or national cemeteries, including the remains of Federal soldiers, sailors, or marines, interred in fields or abandoned private and city cemeteries; and in any case where the expenses of burial or shipment of the remains of officers or enlisted men of the Army who die on the active list are borne by individuals, where such expenses would have been lawful claims against the Government, reimbursement to such individuals may be made of the amount allowed by the Government for such services out of this sum, but no reimbursement shall be made of such expenses incurred prior to July 1, 1910, $250,000: Provided, That during the continuance of the present war the above provisions shall be applicable in the cases of officers and enlisted men on the retired list of the Army who have died or may hereafter die while on active duty by proper assignment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Engineer Department," on page 68, after line 12, to insert:

For installing and operating a ferry line from the vicinity of Seventh and Water Streets to East Potomac Park, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 72, after line 14, to insert:

For purchasing and installing a 10-inch water main across the Aqueduct Bridge, including a 12-inch connection to the 36-inch gravity main in M Street, and a water meter near this connection, for the purpose of supplying water to Federal reservations and buildings on the Virginia side of the Potomac River, $8,100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Department of the Interior," subhead "Public Buildings," on page 87, after line 13, to strike out:

For labor and material for the protection of the Capitol Building and Grounds, including the Senate and House Office Buildings and the Capitol power plant, and for emergencies, and for each and every item incident thereto, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Surveying the Public Lands," in the item of appropriation for surveys and resurveys of public lands, on page 94, line 9, after the words "per month," to strike out: "and not to exceed 10 surveyors who may be employed in a supervisory capacity, whose compensation shall not exceed $250 per month each," so as to read:

The surveys and resurveys provided for in this appropriation to be made by such competent surveyors as the Secretary of the Interior may select, at such compensation, not exceeding $200 per month each, as he may prescribe, except in Alaska, where a compensation not exceeding $300 per month each may be allowed such surveyors, except that the Secretary of the Interior may appoint not to exceed one supervisor of surveys, whose compensation shall not exceed $300 per month, and such per diem in lieu of subsistence, not exceeding $3.50, when allowed pursuant to section 13 of the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 1, 1914.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH subsequently said: Mr. President, may I ask if the amendment on page 94, striking out lines 10 and 11 and part of line 12, was adopted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been adopted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The machinery proceeds so rapidly that it is exceedingly difficult to keep pace with it. While I was reading the bill the amendment must have been adopted, and by the time I woke up to its meaning we were four or five pages further on. If it is not too late, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee the purpose of striking that language from the House bill?

Mr. MARTIN. The language was stricken out because it was thought not to be necessary there.

Mr. SMOOT. Shall I answer the inquiry of the Senator from New York, I will ask the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a year ago this same provision was inserted in the sundry civil appropriation bill. Its object is to provide for 10 surveyors, who may be employed in a supervisory capacity and whose compensation shall not exceed $250 per month each. Should this provision be agreed to, there has been a fear expressed by all the western Senators and all of the western Representatives, as I understand, that these surveyors will be sent out into the public-land States, and that they may interfere with the duties of the present surveyors, who are thoroughly familiar with local conditions. It would be simply adding 10 men to oversee the work of all the surveyors in the public-land States. There is no telling what authority will be given them nor what complications may arise if they undertake to direct the work of present incumbents in office.

If the surveyors in the different States are not doing their duty, the Secretary of the Interior must know it, and they can be removed at any time for cause. I have heard of no complaint that the work is not done well under present conditions, and as outlined by the Department of the Interior; and it seemed that this proposed appropriation of money is not necessary. Not only is it not necessary, but if made it would undoubtedly bring about complications.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I see the striking out of the language is in the interest of economy, and I shall be glad to see the amendment adopted.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "United States Geological Survey," on page 96, at the beginning of line 2, to insert "disbursing clerk, $2,500"; and in line 7, after the words "In all," to strike out "$28,520" and insert "$31,020," so as to make the clause read:

Office of Director: Director, $6,000; chief clerk, $2,500; disbursing clerk, $2,500; librarian, $2,000; photographer, $2,000; assistant photographers—one $900, one $720; clerks—one of class 2, three of class 1, one $1,000, four at $900 each; four copyists, at $720 each; four messenger boys, at $480 each; in all, $31,020.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 98, line 9, after the words "United States Geological Survey," to strike out "$1,260,245.50" and insert "$1,262,745.50," so as to make the clause read:

In all, United States Geological Survey, $1,262,745.50.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Mines," on page 99, after "$287,210," to insert:

Provided, That any license issued under the act of October 6, 1917, may be cancelled by the Director of the Bureau of Mines if the person to whom such license was issued shall, after notice and an opportunity to be heard, be found to have violated any of the provisions of the act: Provided further, That platinum and compounds of platinum are hereby made subject to the terms, conditions, and limitations of said act of October 6, 1917, and the Director of the Bureau of Mines is hereby authorized, under rules and regulations approved by the Secretary of the Interior, to limit the sale, possession, and use of said material."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 100, line 6, after the word "party," to strike out "$100,000" and insert "$200,000," so as to make the clause read:

For inquiries and scientific and technologic investigations concerning the mining, preparation, treatment, and utilization of ores and other mineral substances, with a view to improving health conditions and increasing safety, efficiency, economic development, and conserving resources through the prevention of waste in the mining, quarrying, metallurgical, and other mineral industries; to inquire into the economic conditions affecting these industries; and including all equipment, supplies, expenses of travel and subsistence: Provided, That no part thereof may be used for investigation in behalf of any private party, $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 101, line 24, after the date "nineteen hundred and fifteen," to strike out "$150,000" and insert "$200,000," so as to make the clause read:

For the employment of personal services and all other expenses in connection with the establishment, maintenance, and operation of mining experiment stations, authorized by the act approved March 3, 1915, $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 106, line 18, after the word "paragraph," to insert:

Provided further, That no part of any moneys herein or hereafter appropriated shall be used for the purpose of taking over or in any way interfering with the yards or coal dumps or other facilities for storage and distribution of coal that have been used and occupied in the past year by coal dealers for supplying the general public.

So as to make the clause read:

For the purchase and transportation of fuel; storing and handling fuel in yards; maintenance and operation of yards and equipment, including motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles for inspectors, rentals, and all other expenses requisite for and incident thereto, including personal services in the District of Columbia, $1,154,088, to be available immediately: Provided, That all moneys received from the purchase of fuel during the fiscal year 1919 shall be credited to this appropriation and be available for the purposes of this paragraph: Provided further, That no part of any moneys herein or hereafter appropriated shall be used for the purpose of taking over or in any way interfering with the yards or coal dumps or other facilities for storage and distribution of coal that have been used and occupied in the past year by coal dealers for supplying the general public.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 106, after line 23, to strike out:

One half of the two preceding sums shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 106, line 27, after the words "Bureau of Mines," to strike out "$2,978,075" and insert "$3,145,285," so as to make the clause read:

In all, Bureau of Mines, $3,145,285.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Reclamation Service," on page 112, line 14, after the word "investigations," to strike out "$100,000" and insert "$120,000," so as to make the clause read:

Secondary projects: For cooperative and other miscellaneous investigations, $120,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 113, line 13, after the words "Reclamation Service," to strike out "$9,345,000" and insert "$9,365,000," so as to make the clause read:

In all, Reclamation Service, $9,365,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 113, after line 21, to strike out:

For an investigation to be made by the Reclamation Service of the reclamation by drainage of lands situated in States other than those enumerated in the "reclamation law," including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, purchase, maintenance, repair, hire, and operation of motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles, and for all other expenses, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $100,000.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill why this provision was stricken from the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia desires me to answer as he indicates, I will say to the Senator from Idaho that there is a bill now on the calendar the purpose of which is the drainage of swamp lands. That bill, more than likely, will pass Congress. It provides a full plan for carrying on such work. The item in this bill merely makes an appropriation for an investigation. There is no need of investigating the subject because it is well known where these swamp lands are; the estimated cost of reclaiming them is also known. All the department wants is an authorization to reclaim those lands.

Mr. BORAH. What is the status of the bill to which the Senator refers?

Mr. SMOOT. The bill I refer to is calendar No. 247.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. FALL. May I ask the Senator if the provisions of the bill to which he refers are confined to the drainage of purely swamp lands in States other than those in which there are reclamation projects?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the bill I have in mind provides that swamp lands shall be drained wherever located in the United States.

Mr. FALL. That was my understanding of the matter.

Mr. SMOOT. This is simply an appropriation for an investigation. If the Senator will notice in the bill there was an item for investigating cut-over lands in the same way, and both items have been stricken out.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am inclined to think, in view of the suggestion made by the Senator from Utah as to the reason why this provision was left out, that perhaps it is the proper thing to do. I am only interested in it because of the fact that there are a great many swamp lands which we ought to reclaim.

Mr. SMOOT. That is right.

Mr. BORAH. However, in view of the statement of the Senator, I am not going to interpose any objections.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows that I am in favor of that kind of legislation, and I think all the western Senators and Senators generally are likewise in favor of it, because the question affects not only the Western States but particularly the Southern States and some of the Middle Western States.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I shall not object to the adoption of the amendment striking out the provision because I should, unless that action were taken, offer an amendment which would make this appropriation apply to such investigations not only as to lands aside from those in the reclamation States but as to lands within the reclamation States, where drainage is very much needed.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator will bear me out in the statement that that question has been before the Public Lands Committee of the Senate, and I have no doubt that legislation affecting those lands will be enacted at a very early date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "National parks," on page 118, line 24, after the word "boundary," to insert "for repairing roads in the park and in adjoining forest reserves from Lake Hotel to the Cody entrance"; and on page 119, line 4, after the word "keepers," to strike out "$244,520" and insert "$269,520," so as to make the clause read:

Yellowstone National Park, Wyo.: For administration, protection, maintenance, and improvement, including not to exceed $7,500 for maintenance of the road in the forest reserve leading out of the park from the east boundary, not to exceed $7,500 for maintenance of the road in the forest reserve leading out of the park from the south boundary, for repairing roads in the park and in adjoining forest reserves from Lake Hotel to the Cody entrance, $25,000; not to exceed $7,600 for the purchase, operation, maintenance, and repair of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, and including feed for buffalo and other animals and salaries of buffalo keepers, $269,520, to be expended by and under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That not exceeding $2,000 may be expended for the removal of snow from any of the roads for the purpose of opening them in advance of the tourist season.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 121, after line 15, to insert:

The unexpended balance of the appropriation of $75,000 made in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1918 for Mount Rainier National Park is made available for the fiscal year 1919.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 123, line 5, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$150,000" and insert "$190,000"; and in the same line, after the word "appropriated," to strike out "$100,000" and insert "$140,000," so as to make the clause read:

Hot Springs Reservation, Ark.: For labor, material, supervision, clearing site, and all other necessary expenses incident to the construction of a new administration and Government free bathhouse building, to cost not to exceed $190,000, there is appropriated $140,000, and in addition thereto $50,000 is authorized to be expended therefor from the revenues received from the said reservation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Howard University," on page 125, line 12, after the words "manual arts," to strike out "$15,000" and insert "$20,000," so as to make the clause read:

For tools, materials, fuel, wages of instructors, and other necessary expenses of the department of manual arts, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 125, line 26, after the words "in all," to strike out "$112,937.75" and insert "$117,937.75," so as to make the clause read:

In all, $117,937.75.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Department of Justice," subhead "Miscellaneous objects, Department of Justice," on page 130, line 12, after "$23,000," to strike out:

Provided, That the Department of Justice is directed to expedite the final determination of all said suits.

So as to make the clause read:

Suits to set aside conveyances of allotted lands for removal of restrictions, allotted lands, Five Civilized Tribes: For necessary expenses incident to any suits brought at the request of the Secretary of the Interior in the eastern judicial district of Oklahoma, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney General, $23,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 131, line 3, after the word "at," to strike out "$6 per volume, $90," and insert "$7.50 per volume, $112.50," so as to make the clause read:

For 15 copies of volume 62 of the Lawyers' Cooperative Edition of the United States Reports, to continue sets now in the hands of certain officers, at $7.50 per volume, $112.50.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Judicial," subhead "United States courts," on page 132, line 25, after the word "attorney," to strike out "$620,000" and insert "$660,000," so as to make the clause read:

For salaries of United States district attorneys and expenses of United States district attorneys and their regular assistants, including the office expenses of United States district attorneys in Alaska, and for salaries of regularly appointed clerks to United States district attorneys for services rendered during vacancy in the office of the United States district attorney, $660,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 133, line 22, before the words "per annum," to strike out "$3,500" and insert "$3,500," so as to make the clause read:

For regular assistants to United States district attorneys who are appointed by the Attorney General at a fixed annual compensation, $385,000: Provided, That except as otherwise prescribed by law, the compensation of such of the assistant district attorneys authorized by section 8 of the act approved May 28, 1896, as the Attorney General may deem necessary, may be fixed at not exceeding $3,500 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 134, line 4, after the words "United States," to strike out "$175,000" and insert "$200,000," so as to make the clause read:

For assistants to the Attorney General and to United States district attorneys employed by the Attorney General to aid in special cases, and for payment of foreign counsel employed by the Attorney General in special cases (such counsel shall not be required to take oath of office in accordance with section 366, Revised Statutes of the United States), $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Department of Commerce," subhead "Lighthouses, beacons, fog signals, light vessels, and other works under the Lighthouse Service," on page 143, after line 18, to insert:

Depot for sixteenth lighthouse district: For a lighthouse depot and the necessary equipment for the sixteenth lighthouse district, $90,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 143, after line 21, to strike out:

The appropriation of $15,000 "for the installation of an electrically operated fog-signal whistle on the east breakwater, Nantucket Harbor, Mass., contained in the deficiency appropriation act approved March 28, 1918, is made available for the establishment of an electrically operated fog-signal bell at that point.

Mr. LODGE. In regard to the amendment which has just been read I desire to say to the chairman of the committee——

Mr. MARTIN. I ask that that amendment be disagreed to. It was put in under an impression that the same matter was covered by another bill, but we find that the provision in the other bill is not identical with the provision inserted in this bill.

Mr. LODGE. The item carried in the other bill provided the appropriation, while this item is to authorize the establishment of the fog signal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 162, line 3, after the word "therewith," to strike out "$375,000" and insert "$400,000," so as to make the clause read:

Propagation of food fishes: For maintenance, equipment, and operations of fish-cultural stations, general propagation of food fishes and their distribution, including movement, maintenance, and repairs of cars, purchase of equipment and apparatus, contingent expenses, temporary labor, and not to exceed $10,000 for propagation and distribution of fresh-water mussels and the necessary expenses connected therewith, $400,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 165, to insert:

St. Johnsbury, Vt., station: For the establishment of an auxiliary station on Lake Champlain, including the purchase of land, construction of buildings, and for equipment, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Standards," on page 165, after line 23, to insert:

For additional for the acquisition of land described in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1918, and for the acquisition of certain adjacent land required for the Bureau of Standards, $32,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Department of Labor," subhead "Immigration Service," in the item of appropriation for enforcement of the laws regulating immigration of aliens in the United States, on page 167, line 11, after the words "Secretary of Labor," to strike out "$2,450,000" and insert "$2,000,000," so as to read:

For enforcement of the laws regulating immigration of aliens into the United States, including the contract-labor laws; cost of reports of decisions of the Federal courts, and digests thereof, for the use of the Commissioner General of Immigration; salaries and expenses of all officers, clerks, and employees appointed to enforce said laws, including per diem in lieu of subsistence when allowed pursuant to section 13 of the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 1, 1914; enforcement of the provisions of the act of February 5, 1917, entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States," and acts amendatory thereof; necessary supplies, including exchange of typewriting machines, alterations, and repairs, and for all other expenses authorized by said act; preventing the unlawful entry of Chinese into the United States by the appointment of suitable officers to enforce the laws in relation thereto; expenses of returning to China all Chinese persons found to be unlawfully in the United States, including the cost of imprisonment and actual expenses of conveyance of Chinese persons to the frontier or seaboard for deportation; refunding of head tax and maintenance bills upon presentation of evidence showing conclusively that collection was made through error of Government officers; all to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Labor, $2,000,000:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "War emergency services," on page 169, line 8, after the word "war," to insert "and to aid in the standardization of all wages paid by the Government of the United States and its agencies"; and in line 15, after the word "binding," to strike out "$1,500,000" and insert: "$7,590,000: Provided, That no money now or hereafter appropriated for the payment of wages not fixed by statute shall be available to pay wages in excess of the standard determined upon by the War Labor Policies Board," so as to make the clause read:

To enable the Secretary of Labor, during the present emergency, to furnish such information and to render such assistance in the employment of wage earners throughout the United States as may be deemed necessary in the prosecution of the war and to aid in the standardization of all wages paid by the Government of the United States and its agencies, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, per diem in lieu of subsistence at not exceeding $4, traveling expenses, rental of quarters in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, heat and light, telegraph and telephone service, supplies and equipment, and printing and binding, $7,590,000: Provided, That no money now or hereafter appropriated for the payment of wages not fixed by statute shall be available to pay wages in excess of the standard determined upon by the War Labor Policies Board.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Legislative," on page 172, after line 1, to insert:

Protection of the Capitol during the period of the war: For an additional uniformed police force during the period of the war for the protection of the Capitol Building and Grounds, the Senate and House Office Buildings, and the Capitol Power Plant, and for emergencies, and each and every item incident thereto, $30,000, one-half to be disbursed by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate upon the approval of the Committee on Rules, and one-half by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives upon the approval of the Committee on Accounts: Provided, That the appointment to the positions herein provided for shall be made solely on account of efficiency and special qualifications, and shall not be in patronage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 173, line 5, after the word "superintendent," to insert "purchase, exchange, care, and maintenance of motor-propelled passenger and delivery vehicles," so as to make the clause read:

Botanic Garden: For general repairs to buildings, heating apparatus, painting, glazing, repairs to footwalks and roadways, general repairs to packing sheds, storerooms, and stables, including skilled laborers and laborers at rates to be fixed by the superintendent; purchase, exchange, care, and maintenance of motor-propelled passenger and delivery vehicles; purchase and installation of sanitary drinking fountains; repairing and putting comfort station in sanitary condition; under the direction of the Joint Committee on the Library, $14,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 173, after line 10, to insert:

Senate Office Building: For maintenance, miscellaneous items and supplies, and for all necessary personal and other services for the care and operation of the Senate Office Building, under the direction and supervision of the Senate Committee on Rules, $65,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 173, after line 15, to insert:

For furniture for the Senate Office Building and for labor and material incident thereto and repairs thereof, window shades, awnings, carpets, glass for windows and bookcases, desk lamps, window ventilators, name plates for doors and committee tables, electric fans, etc., $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 173, after line 20, to insert:

For the Capitol: For repairs, improvements, and equipment for Senate kitchens and restaurants, Capitol Building and Senate Office Building, including personal and other services, to be expended by the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, under the supervision of the Committee on Rules, United States Senate, $41,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Government Printing Office," subhead "Office of superintendent of documents," on page 183, line 11, before the words "at $900 each," to strike out "ten" and in lieu thereof to insert "thirty-six"; in line 12, before the word "each," to strike out "twenty-four at $840 each," and in line 24, after the word "all," to strike out "$196,018.40" and insert "$199,258.40," so as to make the clause read:

Superintendent, $3,500; assistant superintendent, $2,500; clerks—2 of class 4, 3 of class 3, 5 of class 2, 8 of class 1, 11 at $1,000 each, 36 at $900 each; cataloguers—1 in charge $1,800, 2 at $1,500 each, 4 at $1,200 each, 1 $1,100, 8 at $1,000 each, 4 at $900 each; cashier, $1,600; librarian, $1,500; foreman, $1,600; assistant foreman, $1,200; stock keepers—1 $1,100, 3 at $1,000 each, 5 at $900 each, three at $720 each; helpers—1 $870, 3 at $750 each; 5 assistant messengers; 3 mailers, at $840 each; 52 skilled laborers, at $688.60 each; 14 unskilled laborers at $688.60 each; janitress, $688.60; 2 folders, at $688.60 each; messenger boys—11 at $500 each, 6 at $420 each, 11 at $375 each; labor necessary to handle current periodicals, $17,000; in all, $199,258.40.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the committee amendments.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, on pages 110 and 111 I notice an appropriation of $1,296,000 for maintenance, operation, continuation of construction, and incidental operations on the Rio Grande project, New Mexico-Texas. On page 111 there is a proviso with reference to the expenditure of this amount which does not occur elsewhere, and except with reference to an appropriation for the same purposes in the last bill, has never appeared, in so far as I am aware, in connection with the expenditure of any money whatsoever under this or any other similar project.

I should like to ask the chairman of the committee why the discrimination should be made in this instance. It never has been made before. There never has been any language of a similar character except in the former bill, where something like $600,000 was appropriated.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I think this same provision has been in previous bills. It came here from the House.

Mr. FALL. No; only in the last bill, where $627,000, I think, was appropriated for drainage.

Mr. MARTIN. It was in the last sundry civil bill.

Mr. FALL. It was; and I will say frankly to the Senator that it is not necessary for me to go into an explanation of how the last item went through, with no attention at all to it as I am now calling attention to this language, except to say that I was not in charge of the matter at that time, not on the committee, had nothing to do with it, and had a prior understanding that such language would not be in the bill—not to that direct effect.

Mr. MARTIN. I will say to the Senator that I did not investigate the matter, as the proviso was in the previous bill, and came from the House in this bill. I am very willing, if the Senator desires it, that it may go out, and I will investigate it.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator allow me, for his information now, to explain my objection to it just in a few words? I will not detain the Senate.

This Rio Grande project was a congressional project, not purely a reclamation project. The Congress of the United States appropriated directly for it $1,000,000 to carry out in part the treaty obligations of the United States with the Republic of Mexico. By virtue of the terms of the treaty between the United States and Mexico, Mexico surrendered in round numbers $35,000,000 of claims against the United States. The United States Congress then appropriated a million dollars to commence this project, directed that it should be completed under the Reclamation Service, with funds furnished from the Reclamation Service, other expenses to be charged up to the water users, as in ordinary reclamation projects.

Now, Mr. President, there has been some dispute, as there has been in the majority of these projects, with reference to the costs which should be charged up against the water users. In this instance the board of survey appointed by the water users and the Reclamation Service found that there should be credits to the water users on this project of something over $800,000. I may be in error as to the exact figures, but at any rate they found that there should be a very substantial credit. The Reclamation Service, as I recall, acting as a board of appeal, did not allow this credit. There has always been, however, a question between the water users and the Reclamation Service as to whether this credit should finally be allowed when the exact amount to be paid back by them to the Government was ascertained, which it never has been.

The conditions under this project are such that fields which have been in cultivation for a hundred years or more are being absolutely ruined to-day, and this money, or the greater portion of it, and the entire amount which was appropriated last year, is sought to be used for the drainage of these lands. Without the drainage the lands can not be used at all; and all the lands under the project between the New Mexico-Texas boundary and the Elephant Butte Dam itself, 100 miles or more, are becoming so waterlogged that they are entirely useless.

The people will do almost anything to secure additional funds with which to have these lands drained. The original estimates of the cost, I may say, were supposed at least by the people there to include drainage. They did not so include drainage. The drainage is proceeding very slowly. Last year an amendment was asked by the Reclamation Service, but under the wording of that amendment and under the wording of this amendment these people must surrender any claim for any just credit whatsoever, whether it is $100,000, $500,000, or, as heretofore ascertained, more than $800,000, before they can get one dollar of this appropriation. Further than that, in my judgment, I will say frankly to the Senator it is a very serious question as to whether they would not be compelled, under the wording of this bill, if they availed themselves of one dollar of the appropriation, to repay the $1,000,000 which was voted by Congress with which to start this project.

I will say very frankly that I am going to come before the Senate in a very short time and ask a very material congressional appropriation for the entire construction. This is a project that was inaugurated by Congress for the purpose of carrying out a treaty agreement. As it stands to-day, these people are charged up with these moneys for the irrigation of 20,000 acres of land free to the Republic of Mexico. The people of New Mexico and Texas are paying for it, and the Government of the United States is not paying a dollar. Before we can avail ourselves of these funds we probably will be compelled at any rate to repay all the amount that the Reclamation Service charges against us, although the board of survey credited us with $800,000, and we probably will be compelled to repay the $1,000,000 heretofore appropriated by Congress. I move to strike out the proviso on page 111.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico moves to strike out the proviso on page 111, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for drainage except in irrigation districts formed under State laws and upon the execution of agreements for the repayment to the United States of all project investments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. I think, after a hurried examination of the bill, that the best place for it would be at the end of line 6, on page 97; but in re-forming the bill it can be put at a more appropriate place, in case the amendment is adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona offers an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 97, at the end of line 6, it is proposed to insert:

For discovering, developing, protecting, and rendering more accessible springs, streams, and water holes on arid public lands of the United States; for erecting and maintaining suitable and durable monuments and signboards; and for providing convenient and ready means, apparatus, and appliances by which water may be brought to the earth's surface, $10,000.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, there is no estimate for that. I know nothing in the world about it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There has been.

Mr. MARTIN. There is none coming to the Committee on Appropriations. That is all I can say.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That may be. This is an item that has been carried in the bill. It was left out last year. It is a yearly item that was conceived to be a continuing appropriation. It was left out of the bill last year. The purpose of the amendment has been fully set forth in the hearings before the House committee as well, and much better, I think——

Mr. MARTIN. I suggest to the Senator that if it is a meritorious amendment he had better wait for a deficiency bill. It is not estimated for here, and it was not even called to the attention of the committee, so that all we know about it is that the Senator gets up on the floor and says he wants the appropriation. There is no estimate at all before the committee in regard to it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is all the Senator knows about it if he will not let the Senator from Arizona state why he wants it.

Mr. MARTIN. I am perfectly willing that the Senator shall do so. As it was not estimated for, I thought perhaps there was not any use in taking up time in discussing it. I will make the point of order against it later, but I do not object to the Senator going on with his speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona has the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, being a man of some little deliberation, I do not see the necessity for this mighty hurry and so little consumption of time. In case I wanted this amendment put on any other bill, I did not think the Senator would be in such enormous haste that I could not at least put in the RECORD an argument that might be used in case I should be absent when the other bill was up.

Mr. MARTIN. Notwithstanding it is entirely out of order, I told the Senator I was perfectly willing that he should go on. I will withhold the point of order until he gets through. I told the Senator that. I have no objection to his speaking just as long as he desires.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I should like to ask the clerk of the committee whether or not an estimate has been made for this, or whether an estimate ever was made for it at any time?

Mr. MARTIN. It is not the clerk's business to answer questions on the floor of the Senate. I asked him about it, and he confirmed my recollection that no estimate whatever was brought to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I did not expect the clerk to answer me. I expected that the clerk would look and see.

Mr. MARTIN. He has looked, at my request, and reports that no estimate whatever has reached the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. MARTIN. I make the point of order that it has not been estimated for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina offers an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 172, after line 14, it is proposed to insert:

The unexpended balance of the appropriation of $20,000 for the Joint Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the act entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes," approved April 17, 1917, is hereby continued available until expended.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I think that is a very proper amendment, and it ought to be adopted. It is for the expenses of a Senate committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I wish to call up an amendment which I have heretofore offered. It is on line 14, page 112.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming offers an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 112, after line 14, it is proposed to insert the following:

Green River watershed projects, Wyoming: For the investigation and survey of an irrigation system in the Green River watershed, Wyoming, including the Bonneville, Seedskadee, Big Piney-Labarge, Opal, Church Butte projects, and to enable the Secretary of the Interior to prepare a report, to be submitted before the first regular session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, on the feasibility of establishing a plan of land settlement and home loans to encourage the colonization of the territory included within the Green River watershed projects by honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the military and naval forces of the United States, $50,000.

Mr. MARTIN. I make the point of order that that is not estimated for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point is sustained.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Wyoming also offers the following amendment:

Wiley project, Wyoming: For the investigation and survey of the Wiley project, Wyoming, $10,000.

Mr. MARTIN. I make the same point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. OWEN. On page 128 the act provides that the courts hereafter shall be open to seamen. In line 13, I move after "United States" that the words be inserted "including appellate courts." I think it probably means that, but it ought to be left without any doubt about it. There might questions arise as to whether it did include appellate courts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator must mean line 12.

Mr. OWEN. Under the head "fees of clerks."

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has the wrong print. The Senator will find it on page 131.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; under the head "Judicial."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the Senator will find the item on page 134, after the words "United States," in line 6.

Mr. OWEN. On page 134, after the words "United States," in line 6, so as to read: "That courts of the United States, including appellate courts, hereafter shall be open to seamen." A question arose, I understand, as to whether it really included appellate courts, and I think it ought to be made clear.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. I offer the following amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 88, at the bottom of the page, insert:

Reclamation of swamp lands and cut-over timberlands. For an investigation to be made by the Secretary of the Interior of the reclamation by drainage of lands outside existing reclamation projects and of the reclamation and preparation for cultivation of cut-over timberlands in any of the States of the United States, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, purchase, maintenance, repair, hire, and operation of motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger vehicles, and for all other expenses, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $100,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is an amendment which was offered in the committee, and the committee disagreed to it. What I said in relation to the amendment on page 113 applies to this amendment in the same way. As the Senator will notice, Calendar No. 247, Senate bill 758, is a bill introduced by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] to increase the productive agricultural area of the United States by the reclamation of arid and swamp lands therein. That question has been before the House and Senate for a good many years. The Committee on Public Lands of the Senate has acted upon it and reported this bill which covers every phase of the work. There is no necessity of an investigation. The reports have been made from the Interior Department, and I expect to see Senate bill 758 passed at this session of Congress.

I am informed that a similar bill has been reported by the House, and there is no question but that this legislation will pass at a very early day. There is no necessity for spending $100,000 for an investigation.

I hope, therefore, that the amendment will not be agreed to for that reason, not that the object of the appropriation should not be obtained, but I think that it has already been investigated, and legislation has been reported to the Senate carrying out the provision of the pending amendment. As I have already stated, it has been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and I have no doubt but what it will become a law at a very early day. It seems to me that the appropriation is useless at this time.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the House of Representatives passed a bill containing a provision similar to the one which I have offered in this amendment, but different from it in two particulars. The first particular in which the House provision differs from this amendment is found in the fact that the investigation was to be made by the Reclamation Service. The second provision is that the investigation shall also apply under my amendment to cut-over lands.

The Senator from Utah has opposed the insertion of this amendment on the ground that a bill introduced by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has been favorably reported from the appropriate committee and contemplates dealing with one of these subjects in a comprehensive way. He also asserts that the appropriation is unnecessary. He takes a very different view of the matter from that asserted by those who are charged with direct responsibility in connection with these lands.

The Secretary of the Interior has sent to the Senate a communication, which I take the liberty of having inserted in the RECORD in connection with my remarks, asking for a very much larger sum to be used in the survey, investigation, and reclamation of these two classes of lands. The sum that is now suggested by the department is very much in excess of the amount carried in my amendment.

I shall be content, and those of us who are interested directly in this amendment will be content, with the appropriation of the amount which the amendment carries. The work is a very important one. At the close of other wars the United States had available for the use of its returning soldiers vast areas of fertile public land. At the close of the war in which we are now engaged we shall have only arid and cut-over lands which may be used by them with the exception of very small areas of other classes of lands.

The primary purpose of this investigation and survey is to ascertain what areas of land are available and what use can best be made of them, how they may be appropriated to the use of these soldiers, and put in a condition where they may enjoy them and occupy them.

Mr. MARTIN. If the Senator will excuse me, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN. As I understood it, every acre of these lands is in private ownership, not public land and not subject to allotment to soldiers or anybody else. They are privately owned.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; not all of them are in private ownership. The greater portion of them are in private ownership. They are privately owned or State owned. Nevertheless, they are a resource of which the Government can avail itself for the benefit of these soldiers. The mere fact that these lands happen to be in private ownership does not relieve the Government from all responsibility in connection with the utilization of them. We want to make the best possible use of them, even though they may have passed into private ownership.

In my opinion the appropriation of this sum is both necessary and desirable. There are vast areas of lands in the United States known as cut-over lands of which no use is now being made, but of which very beneficial use may be made if proper investigations and surveys can be had to determine their status and their uses. It is the purpose of this amendment to obtain the necessary information to accomplish that end.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I think the purpose referred to by the Senator from Arkansas is one of very great consequence. When this war is over we shall have from two to four million people coming back from Europe out of employment. We shall have probably not less than 4,000,000 people thrown out of employment by closing up the factories now engaged in the manufacture of munitions of war and materials of war. I think we should go much further than this amendment proposes and take steps now to organize in the way of preparedness for giving occupation to the men after the war is over. Otherwise we shall have on our hands from six to eight million unemployed people, with consequences of great possible disturbance in the United States.

I hope at some convenient moment the Senate will consider it even on a very much broader basis of preparing for after-the-war conditions.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I agree with what the Senator from Oklahoma says in relation to taking into consideration the reconstruction period after the war. I have already called the attention of the Senate to it on one or two occasions. But I want to say we are already preparing on a larger scale than this amendment provides. It is for an investigation. We have on the calendar a bill that provides a special fund of $10,000,000 for the reclamation of swamp land. It provides that the Government may issue $25,000,000 worth of bonds for the purpose of carrying out the reclamation of these swamp lands. It goes into details, as the Senator will see if he will take the time to look at Calendar No. 247, Senate bill 758. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to reclaim swamp lands in the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. In just a moment. As soon as I finish.

Mr. ROBINSON. For a question.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; just as soon as I finish I shall yield to the Senator. If he will look at the calendar, he will find a report from the Secretary of the Interior in relation to this very problem. I have no doubt in my mind but that that bill is going to become a law at an early date, and that provides a working plan; it provides the money for it. The amendment that we are considering now is an appropriation of only $100,000 for an investigation. There is no one who does not know as to cut-over lands in the Northwest and in the South. The Interior Department knows. They may not know exactly the number of acres, but they have recommended legislation along the line of reclaiming those lands, and the subject is before the Public Lands Committee now. They reported out the reclamation bill, and I have no doubt but that they are going to report out the cut-over land bill.

I want to get at this thing at the earliest date possible. I do not want to spend any more time on investigations. We know that it ought to be done. Let us pass legislation now to carry it out. That is why I am opposed to appropriating $100,000 for further investigation. That seems to me to be useless. I now yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. I did intend to ask the Senator a question, but I shall make some observations first, in view of his last statement.

Mr. President, the bill the Senator from Utah has referred to is pending on the calendar. Like a great many other bills that are reported by Senate committees, it may or may not receive consideration by the Senate, and if it passes the Senate it may or may not receive consideration at the other end of the Capitol. In other words, we have no assurance whatever that Calendar No. 247, about which the Senator from Utah has spoken, will ever be passed.

But I maintain that the item carried in the amendment which I have offered is in no wise inconsistent with the bill to which the Senator from Utah has referred. The amendment provides for an investigation and a survey of these lands, which would have to be made even if Calendar No. 247 were subsequently passed, because it will be impossible to deal with this subject comprehensively and effectively without the survey and the investigation that the amendment contemplates. The survey and investigation will have to be made at some time, and to defeat this amendment would only delay it.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator having the bill in charge if there has been an estimate made for this appropriation of $100,000?

Mr. MARTIN. An estimate for a much larger sum was shown to me to-day. It has not reached the committee. It has to go to the Vice President and be referred to the committee. It has not gone through those channels. Unofficially a copy has been shown me making an estimate for a much larger sum for this purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. It came in to-day?

Mr. MARTIN. In the last few hours.

Mr. SMOOT. We refused in the committee to put this appropriation of $100,000 in the bill. There was no estimate before the committee when we voted on it.

Mr. MARTIN. It was not in committee. It reached the Senate since the bill has been reported.

Mr. SMOOT. It has not been received by the committee.

Mr. MARTIN. It has not been. It was sent to the desk, and goes into the RECORD now on the request of the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be inserted in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, June 24, 1918.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I transmit herewith an estimate in the sum of $1,000,000 for survey, investigation, and study looking to the reclamation of arid lands, cut-over timberlands, and swamp lands, with a view to the furnishing of occupation and homes for returning soldiers and sailors.

I have to request that it be at once forwarded to Congress for consideration in connection with sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 12441), which is now pending before the Senate, and to be submitted in lieu of lines 24 to 26, page 108, and lines 1 to 6, page 106.

Cordially, yours,

ALEXANDER T. VOGELSANG,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. W. G. MCADOO,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Reclamation of arid, swamp, and cut-over lands: For survey, investigation, and study by the Secretary of the Interior, through such agencies as he may select, including consideration of the policy or plans to be pursued by the United States, for effecting the reclamation of arid lands, cut-over timberlands, and swamp lands, with a view to the furnishing of occupation and homes for soldiers and sailors of the United States upon their return from the existing war and discharge from the military service, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, purchase, maintenance, repair, hire, and operation of motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles, and for all other expenses, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated $1,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary (submitted), $1,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, I do not want to take any advantage of the fact that the estimate was not before the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. There is no doubt about the amendment being in order, because the House passed a provision which makes this amendment in order. Perhaps I should ask that it be inserted at a different place in the bill. If the Senator from Utah insists on that, I will change my amendment so as to ask that it be inserted at page 113, after line 21. A point of order does not lie, because the bill as it came to the Senate carried a provision substantially similar to the one which I have offered. All I have to do is to move to concur in the House provision with an amendment, but I hope the Senator from Utah will not insist upon my pursuing that course. It is more convenient to pursue the course I have taken. I understand the Senator does not raise a point of order.

Mr. SMOOT. As an estimate has come in I will not make a point of order against the amendment on that ground, but I will say that the item to which the Senator from Arkansas refers on page 113, the Senate has already stricken out.

Mr. ROBINSON. We could restore it, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; we could restore it.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is, if we had the votes to do it. A point of order would not lie against it.

Mr. SMOOT. But that refers only to the reclamation of swamp lands.

Mr. ROBINSON. I know. It is subject to amendment, however.

Mr. SMOOT. Provided the Senate reverses its action and allows it to remain in the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly. Of course, if the Senator insists on my pursuing that course, I shall ask the Senate to reconsider its action by which it agreed to the amendment of the committee striking out the item from line 22, on page 113, to line 5, on page 114.

Mr. MARTIN. A point of order has not been made against it.

Mr. ROBINSON. A point of order, I understand, is not made.

Mr. SMOOT. If the chairman does not want to make a point of order, I am not going to do it.

Mr. MARTIN. In view of the estimate that has reached us, though somewhat informally, I do not feel like making a point of order. So far as I am concerned, I am very willing to have it go to conference; but it may be very difficult to retain it. I hope the Senator realizes that if the Senate sees fit to adopt it, of course I will do the best I can in conference; but he will realize that it may be very difficult to retain it.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I intended to say something on this amendment, but I have learned that when a case is practically won it is best to be silent. If the Senator from Virginia does not object to putting the amendment on the bill, I do not wish to say anything. But I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that the bill, Calendar No. 247, refers to the reclamation of arid and semi-arid lands, or the drainage of water-logged land within the States covered by the reclamation law.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I said.

Mr. RANSDELL. This amendment of the Senator from Arkansas refers to all lands of the United States—arid, swamp, and cut-over lands—anywhere and everywhere in the United States. It is a much more comprehensive provision. I do not wish to read the letter from the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane, addressed to the President of the United States on the 31st of May, a copy of which, I think, was sent to all Senators. It is a very comprehensive and wise letter. If I am permitted to have it printed in the RECORD, I shall not read it. Otherwise, I feel that I must read it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What letter is it?

Mr. RANSDELL. It is a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane, addressed to the President of the United States on this very subject.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I object to its being printed in the RECORD without being read.

Mr. RANSDELL. Then I shall have to read it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I hope the Senator from Arizona will not make that objection. It would simply delay the Senate for half an hour to read it.

Mr. RANSDELL. I can read it as a part of my remarks.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There is not a Member of the Senate who has not had a copy of the letter sent to him.

Mr. RANSDELL. But it has not gone into the RECORD, and it is a very important letter.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Very well; I have a very high regard for the Secretary of the Interior, and I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, May 31, 1918.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I believe the time has come when we should give thought to the preparation of plans for providing opportunity for our soldiers returning from the war. Because this department has handled similar problems, I consider it my duty to bring this matter to the attention of yourself and Congress.

Every country has found itself face to face with this situation at the close of a great war. From Rome, under Caesar, to France, under Napoleon, down even to our own Civil War, the problem arose as to what could be done with the soldiers to be mustered out of military service.

At the close of the Civil War America faced a somewhat similar situation. But, fortunately, at that time the public domain offered opportunity to the home-returning soldiers. The great part the veterans of that war played in developing the West is one of our epics. The homestead law had been signed by Lincoln in the second year of the war, so that out of our wealth in lands we had farms to offer the million of veterans. It was also the era of transcontinental railway construction. It was likewise the period of rapid, yet broad and full, development of towns and communities and States.

To the great number of returning soldiers land will offer the great and fundamental opportunity. The experience of wars points out the lesson that our service men, because of Army life with its openness and activity, will largely seek out-of-doors vocations and occupations. This fact is accepted by the allied European nations. That is why their programs and policies of relocating and readjustment emphasize the opportunities on the land for the returning soldier. The question then is, "What land can be made available for farm homes for our soldiers?"

We do not have the bountiful public domain of the sixties and seventies. In a literal sense, for the use of it on a generous scale for soldier farm homes as in the sixties, "the public domain is gone." The official figures at the end of the fiscal year June 30, 1917, show this: We have unappropriated land in the continental United States to the amount of 230,657,755 acres. It is safe to say that not one-half of this land will ever prove to be cultivable in any sense. So we have no land in any way comparable to that in the public domain when Appomattox came and men turned westward with Army rifle and "roll blanket" to begin life anew.

While we do not have that matchless public domain of '65, we do have millions of acres of undeveloped lands that can be made available for our home-coming soldiers. We have arid lands in the West; cut-over lands in the Northwest, Lake States, and South; and also swamp lands in the Middle West and South, which can be made available through the proper development. Much of this land can be made suitable for farm homes if properly handled. But it will require that each type of land be dealt with in its own particular fashion. The arid land will require water, the cut-over land will require clearing, and the swamp land must be drained. Without any of these aids they remain largely "no man's land." The solution of these problems is no new thing. In the admirable achievement of the Reclamation Service in reclamation and drainage we have abundant proof of what can be done.

Looking toward the construction of additional projects, I am glad to say that plans and investigations have been under way for some time. A survey and study has been in the course of consummation by the Reclamation Service in the Great Colorado Basin. That great project, I believe, will appeal to the new spirit of America. It would mean the conquest of an empire in the Southwest. It is believed that more than 3,000,000 acres of arid land could be reclaimed by the completion of the Upper and Lower Colorado Basin projects.

It has been officially estimated that more than 15,000,000 acres of irrigable land now remain in the Government's hands. This is the great remaining storehouse of Government land for reclamation. Under what policy and program millions of these acres could be reclaimed for future farms and homes remains for legislation to determine. The amount of swamp and cut-over lands in the United States that can be made available for farming is extensive. Just how much there is has never been determined with any degree of accuracy. Practically all of it has passed into private ownership. For that reason, in considering its use, it would be necessary to work out a policy between the private owners and the Government unless the land was purchased. It has been estimated that the total area of swamp and overflowed lands in the United States is between seventy and eighty million acres. Of this amount, it is stated that about "60,000,000 acres can be reclaimed and made profitable for agriculture." The undeveloped swamp lands lie chiefly in Florida, in the States along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, in the Mississippi Delta, and in Missouri, Indiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and California.

What amount of land in its natural state unfit for farm homes can be made suitable for cultivation by drainage only thorough surveys and studies can develop. We know that authentic figures show that more than 15,000,000 acres have been reclaimed for profitable farming, most of which lies in the Mississippi River Valley.

The amount of cut-over lands in the United States, of course, it is impossible even in approximation to estimate. These lands, however, lie largely in the South Atlantic and Gulf States, the Lake States, and the Northwestern States. A rough estimate of their number is about 200,000,000 acres—that is, of land suitable for agricultural development. Substantially all this cut-over or logged-off land is in private ownership. The failure of this land to be developed is largely due to inadequate method of approach. Unless a new policy of development is worked out in cooperation between the Federal Government, the States, and the individual owners, a greater part of it will remain unsettled and uncultivated. The undeveloped cut-over lands lie chiefly in the Pacific Northwest (particularly in Washington and Oregon), in the Lake States (Minnesota, Michigan, and Wisconsin), and in the South Atlantic and Gulf Coastal States (Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas).

Any plan for the development of land for the returning soldier will come face to face with the fact that a new policy will have to meet the new conditions. The era of free or cheap land in the United States has passed. We must meet the new conditions of developing lands in advance; security must to a degree displace speculation. Some of the defects in our old system have been described by Dr. Elwood Mead in these words:

"Science (should) have gone hand in hand with the settlement of the arid and semiarid country, and all that science could give would have been utilized, first, in the creation of the conditions of settlement and then in aiding the settler in difficult tasks. Because nothing was done, these heroic but uninformed souls were bedeviled by the winds, cold, drought, and insect pests. They wasted their efforts, lost their hopes and ambitions, and a tragic percentage left, impoverished and embittered. The tragic part of this history is that nearly all this suffering and loss could have been avoided under a carefully thought-out plan of development."

There are certain tendencies which we ought to face frankly in our consideration of a policy for land to the home-coming soldier. First, the drift to farm tenancy. The experience of the world shows without question that the happiest people, the best farms, and the soundest political conditions are found where the farmer owns the home and the farm lands. The growth of tenancy in America shows an increase of 32 per cent for the 20 years between 1890 and 1910. Second, the drift to urban life. In 1880 of the total population of the United States 29.5 per cent of our people resided in cities and 70.5 per cent in the country. At the census of 1910, 46.3 per cent resided in cities and 53.7 per cent remained in the country. It is evident that since the war in Europe there has been a decided increase in the trend toward the city because of industrial conditions. The adoption by the United States of new policies in its land-development plans for returning veterans will also contribute to the amelioration of these two dangers to American life. A plan of land development whereby land is developed in large areas, subdivided into individual farms, then sold to actual bona fide farmers on a long-time payment basis has been in force not only in the United States under the reclamation act but also in many other countries for several years. It has proved a distinct success. In Denmark, Ireland, New Zealand, and the Australian Commonwealth it has completely changed the land situation. One of the new features of this plan is that holders are aided in improving and cultivating the farm. In a word, there is organized community development. Its beneficial results have been well described by the Canadian commission which was appointed to investigate its results in New Zealand in these words:

"* * * The farmers have built better houses or remodeled their old ones, brought a larger acreage of land under cultivation that would otherwise be lying idle; have bought and kept better live stock; have bought and urged more labor-saving machinery on the farms and in the houses. * * * They keep more sheep and pigs and have so largely increased the revenue from their farms that they are able to meet the payments on the mortgages and to adopt a higher standard of living and a better one. Throughout the country a higher and better civilization is gradually being evolved; the young men and women who are growing up are happy and contented to remain at home on the farm and find ample time and opportunity for recreation and entertainment of a kind more wholesome and elevating than can be obtained in the cities."

It may be said that this country, outside of Alaska, has no frontier to-day. Of course, Alaska will still offer opportunity for a pioneer life. And of course Alaska likewise has yet unknown remarkable agricultural possibilities, but unless we make possible the development of this land by the men who desire their life in that field we will lose a great national opportunity.

This is an immediate duty. It will be too late to plan for these things when the war is over. Our thought now should be given to the problem. And I therefore desire to bring to your mind the wisdom of immediately supplying the Interior Department with a sufficient fund with which to make the necessary surveys and studies. We should know by the time the war ends, not merely how much arid land can be irrigated, nor how much swamp land reclaimed, nor where the grazing land is and how many cattle it will support, nor how much cut-over land can be cleared, but we should know with definiteness where it is practicable to begin new irrigation projects, what the character of the land is, what the nature of the improvements needed will be, and what the cost will be. We should know also, not in a general way, but with particularity, what definite areas of swamp land may be reclaimed, how they can be drained, what the cost of the drainage will be, what crops they will raise. We should have in mind specific areas of grazing lands, with a knowledge of the cattle which are best adapted to them, and the practicability of supporting a family upon them. So, too, with our cut-over lands. We should know what it would cost to pull or "blow out" stumps and to put the lands into condition for a farm home.

And all this should be done upon a definite planning basis. We should think as carefully of each one of these projects as George Washington thought of the planning of the city of Washington. We should know what it will cost to buy these lands if they are in private hands. In short, at the conclusion of the war the United States should be able to say to its returned soldiers: "If you wish to go upon a farm, here are a variety of farms, of which you may take your pick, which the Government has prepared against the time of your returning." I do not mean by this to carry the implication that we should do any other work now than the work of planning. A very small sum of money put into the hands of men of thought, experience, and vision will give us a program which will make us feel entirely confident that we are not to be submerged industrially or otherwise by labor which we will not be able to absorb, or that we would be in a condition where we would show a lack of respect for those who return as heroes, but who will be without means of immediate self-support.

A million or two dollars, if appropriated now, will put this work well under way.

This plan does not contemplate anything like charity to the soldier. He is not to be given a bounty. He is not to be made to feel that he is a dependent. On the contrary, he is to continue, in a sense, in the service of the Government. Instead of destroying our enemies, he is to develop our resources.

The work that is to be done, other than the planning, should be done by the soldier himself. The dam or the irrigation project should be built by him; the canals, the ditches, the breaking of the land, and the building of the houses should, under proper direction, be his occupation. He should be allowed to make his own home, cared for while he is doing it, and given an interest in the land, for which he can pay through a long period of years, perhaps 30 or 40 years. This same policy can be carried out as to the other classes of land. So that the soldier, on his return, would have an opportunity to make a home for himself, to build a home with money which we would advance and which he would repay, and for the repayment we would have an abundant security. The farms should not be turned over as the prairies were—unbroken, unfenced, without accommodations for men or animals. There should be prepared homes, all of which can be constructed by the men themselves and paid for by them under a system of simple devising by which modern methods of finance will be applied to their needs.

As I have indicated this is not a mere Utopian vision. It is, with slight variations, a policy which other countries are pursuing successfully. The plan is simple. I will undertake to present to the Congress definite projects for the development of this country through the use of the returned soldier by which the United States, lending its credit, may increase its resources and its population and the happiness of its people with a cost to itself of no more than the few hundred thousand dollars that it will take to study this problem through competent men. This work should not be postponed.

Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE.

Hon. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL,
United States Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask that the amendment be again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again read. The Chair would like to know from the Senator from Arkansas if he desires to have the amendment go in? Is it on page 88?

Reclamation of swamp lands and cut-over timberlands: For an investigation, to be made by the Secretary of the Interior, of the reclamation by drainage of lands outside existing reclamation projects, and of the reclamation and preparation for cultivation of cut-over timberlands in any of the States of the United States, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, purchase, maintenance, repair, hire, and operation of motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger vehicles, and for all other expenses, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $100,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENDRICK. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 112, line 14, after the word "investigations," strike out the comma and insert the following:

And to enable the Secretary of the Interior to prepare a report to be submitted before the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, on the feasibility of constructing an irrigation system in the Green River watershed, Wyoming, including the Bonneville, Seedskadee, Opal, Big Piney-La Barge, and Church Butte projects.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, that is plainly subject to a point of order. I hope the Senator will not insist on bringing in these amendments that have not been presented to the committee.

Mr. KENDRICK. In a sense I do not agree that it is subject to a point of order, for the reason that it simply provides that these lands shall be investigated in the way of surveys along with other lands.

Mr. MARTIN. To save time, I will let it go to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming.

On a division the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The SECRETARY. At the end of page 173, insert:

To enable the Joint Committee on the Library to provide for the restoration and completion of the historical frieze in the Rotunda of the Capitol, and to select an appropriate design for the completion of the frieze, and to employ such artists in the work of completion and restoration as may demonstrate to the satisfaction of said joint committee their ability to perform the work in a proper manner, $20,000.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the exact language of this amendment was passed in the Senate in the form of a joint resolution during the present session, January 28, 1918, by unanimous consent of the Senate. I ask for the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. On March 23 there was an item passed by the Senate in favor of the Cherokee Indians, providing for the payment of certain interest due them. The bill has been favorably reported in the House, and I hope the Senate will be willing to have this item placed in the bill. It reads as follows:

That the general deficiency appropriation act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. L., p. 664), so far as the said act provides for the payment of the judgment of the Court of Claims of May 18, 1905, in favor of the Cherokee Nation, with interest (40 Ct. Cls. Repts., p. 252), be, and the same hereby is, so amended as to allow additional interest to be paid upon items 1 and 4 of said judgment, and upon the funds arising from said items 1 and 4, respectively, as follows, to wit: On the amount of the fund which arose from item 1 of said judgment as such amount was determined and paid to the Secretary of the Interior on July 2, 1906, to be by him credited to the principal of the Cherokee school fund, interest at 5 per cent per annum from July 2, 1906, to and including May 26, 1910; on the amount of the fund which arose from item 4 of said judgment, as such amount was determined and paid to the Secretary of the Interior on July 2, 1906, to be by him credited to the principal of the Cherokee national fund, interest at 5 per cent per annum from July 2, 1906, to and including May 26, 1910; on the original principal sum of item 4 of said judgment, interest at 5 per cent per annum from July 1, 1893, to July 1, 1903, and on the amount of the interest thus accruing interest at 4 per cent per annum from December 29, 1905, to May 14, 1906; and on the aggregate of the sums of the interest for the last two periods herein above mentioned, interest at 5 per cent per annum from July 2, 1906, to the date of the passage of this act; and the sum of $27,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the interest above allowed, is hereby appropriated and authorized to be paid to the Cherokee Nation: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay the amount arising from item 4 of said judgment, with interest thereon as herein above provided for, to the agent appointed by the Cherokee Nation acting through its principal chief to receive the same. Said payment to be made immediately upon the approval of this act.

Mr. MARTIN. That item, I will say to the Senator, I think ought to be presented on the deficiency bill. There is no estimate at all, and we know nothing in the world about it. It has not been presented to the committee.

Mr. OWEN. Pardon me, Senator, it passed the Senate upon a favorable report of the committee and upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior that the money was due to the Cherokees, the balance of interest due them being $27,500.

Mr. MARTIN. It belongs distinctly, then, upon the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. OWEN. I think that is possibly true, but the Senate already having disposed of it and it having been reported in the House favorably I thought there would be no objection to letting it go on the bill here and getting it out of the road.

Mr. MARTIN. I make a point of order against the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. OWEN. On page 134, I move to insert the following words, in line 11, after the word "safety."

The SECRETARY. On page 134, line 11, after the word "safety," insert "and whenever a prima facie showing is made that any regulation or ruling made by any department to enforce such laws is contrary to any law to promote the health and safety of seamen, and tends to hinder the proper enforcement of such law, on complaint of any seaman affected by such regulation or ruling, it shall be the duty of such courts to review such regulation or ruling and to determine whether it be in accord with the law, and if determined not to be in accord with the law, the court shall enter an order setting aside such regulation or ruling; either party to such suit shall have the right to appeal from a decision of an inferior court."

Mr. MARTIN. I make a point of order against the amendment. It is plain legislation upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to say in justification of the matter that the regulations for seamen practically nullify the law, and there is no adequate way in which they can have the law properly sustained except through the order of the court.

Mr. MARTIN. That emphasizes my point of order, that it is legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained. If there are no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I have been absent from the room. On page 35 there is a provision with reference to the Committee on Public Information, a proviso that a report of the receipts and expenditures under that appropriation shall be made to Congress on the first day of each regular session. I take it that report does not cover a statement of the employees. Would there be any objection to having that inserted?

Mr. MARTIN. No objection in the world.

Mr. KENYON. After the word "appropriation," in line 3, page 35, I move to insert the words: "which shall also contain a list of employees and salaries paid.

Mr. MARTIN. I accept the amendment as far as I can do so. I think it is a proper one.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDER. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator in charge of the bill with reference to the item on page 105, beginning in line 6, "Government fuel yards." I ask the Senator from Virginia if those yards are to be utilized only for the purpose of supplying the Government with fuel.

Mr. MARTIN. Only for the Government agencies.

Mr. CALDER. And not for the purpose of having the Government go into the business of supplying fuel?

Mr. MARTIN. Not at all; the Government is only to furnish its own service.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Government and the District of Columbia?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes; that is a part of the Government.

Mr. CALDER. Will it operate in any other place except in the District of Columbia?

Mr. MARTIN. Nowhere, except in the District of Columbia.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the bill is voted upon I desire to say that it had been my purpose to make some observations on the item relating to the Shipping Board and the appropriations for the Shipping Board and the Fleet Corporation, but for reasons I will not state I do not feel like doing it to-day. I may possibly before the session ends take occasion to address myself to the question of the American merchant marine, which will be involved in what I thought of saying to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed?

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12281) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with and that the bill may be read for amendment, committee amendments first to be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, committee amendments to be first considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement for the information of the Senate. The items of money appropriated in this bill are practically the same as are the items in the bill as it came from the other House; there are very few changes in the amounts appropriated. There is, however, quite a little affirmative legislation at the end of the bill. That was brought about by this condition of things: A good many bills which were being urged by the department upon Congress as necessary successfully to prosecute the war passed the Senate and went to the other House, but did not get out of committee there, with the result that it is very improbable that any of that important legislation will pass. The chairman of the House Committee on Military Affairs and a member of that committee came over here; we had a consultation, and practically agreed, so far as we were able to agree, that this affirmative legislation must go on the bill if it were going to be passed at this session at all. So I call the attention of the Senate to that condition of affairs as a reason for the new legislation at the end of the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 2, line 1, after the word "Army" to strike out "All" and to insert "For all"; so as to read:

Contingencies of the Army: For all contingent expenses of the Army not otherwise provided for and embracing all branches of the military service, including the office of the Chief of Staff.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 14, after the words "Secretary of War," to strike out "$1,500,000" and to insert "$2,000,000," so as to make the clause read:

Contingencies, military information section, General Staff Corps: For contingent expenses of the military information section, General Staff Corps, including the purchase of law books, professional books of reference, periodicals and newspapers, drafting and messenger service, and of the military attachés at the United States embassies and legations abroad; and of the branch office of the military information section at Manila, and the cost of special instruction at home and abroad and in maintenance of students and attachés; and for such other purposes as the Secretary of War may deem proper; to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $2,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "The Adjutant General's Department," on page 5, line 7, after the word "commands" to insert "and such commanding officers are hereby authorized when making purchases, under this appropriation, of the class of articles herein provided for, to exchange as a part of the purchase price for the new articles similar articles formerly purchased under like authority which have become useless or antiquated," so as to make the clause read:

Contingencies, headquarters of military departments, districts, and tactical commands: For contingent expenses at the headquarters of the several territorial departments, territorial districts, tactical divisions and brigades, including the Staff Corps serving thereat, being for the purchase of the necessary articles of office, toilet, and desk furniture, stationery, ice, and potable water for office use when necessary, binding, maps, technical books of reference, professional and technical newspapers and periodicals, payment for which may be made in advance, and police utensils, to be allotted by the Secretary of War, and to be expended in the discretion of the commanding officers of the several military departments, districts, and tactical commands, and such commanding officers are hereby authorized when making purchases, under this appropriation, of the class of articles herein provided for, to exchange as a part of the purchase price for the new articles similar articles formerly purchased under like authority which have become useless or antiquated, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, after line 11, to insert:

Palace of Fine Arts, Presidio, San Francisco, Cal.: That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion to convey to the regents of the University of California, their successors and assigns, for art, education, and park purposes and for the benefit of the people of the city and county of San Francisco and the public generally, that portion of the military reservation of the Presidio of San Francisco, in the city and county of San Francisco, Cal., on which the Palace of Fine Arts is located, included within metes and bounds, described as follows, namely:

Commencing at the point on the westerly line of Lyon Street, distant therefrom 5.17 feet southerly from the northerly line of Bay Street, if extended and produced westerly, and running thence northerly along the westerly line of Lyon Street 1,196.80 feet; thence southwesterly on a curve to the left of 612 feet radius, central angle 155° 47′ 50″, tangent to a line deflected 102° 6′ 5″ to the left from the preceding course a distance of 1,664.13 feet to the westerly line of Lyon Street and the point of commencement, containing 9.93 acres, more or less.

That if at any time in the future the property so conveyed to said regents shall cease to be used for the purposes for which conveyed, then all right and title thereto herein authorized to be granted to said regents shall revert to the United States.

That in consideration of the said grant, the said regents shall procure from the city and county of San Francisco the consent of said city and county to a judgment being rendered and entered against the said city and county in eminent domain proceedings to be instituted by the United States Government against said city and county for the purpose of acquiring from said city and county all right, title, and interest that said city and county may have in and to any lands situated within the city and county of San Francisco, Cal., located as the Secretary of War may approve and which he may deem satisfactory and useful in connection with said reservation.

That the said regents or the Secretary of War shall procure to be executed by the said city and county of San Francisco a warranty to the United States Government of perpetual quiet possession to said lands.

That in any such judgment in eminent domain as may be so rendered and entered, there may be reserved to the city and county of San Francisco in such lands to be so acquired, such rights and interests as in the discretion of the Secretary of War should properly be reserved to said city and county of San Francisco, and also a condition that the said lands shall revert to the city and county of San Francisco in the event of the United States Government ceasing to use the lands for the purposes for which they may be so acquired in said eminent domain proceedings.

That the provision in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes," approved May 12, 1917 (ch. 12, p. 57, 40th Rev. Stat.), authorizing the Secretary of War to convey to the regents of the University of California, for art, educational, and park purposes, that portion of the military reservation of the Presidio, San Francisco, on which the Palace of Fine Arts is located, in consideration of the transfer to the United States of other lands situated within the said city and county, be and is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, to increase the total appropriation for "Construction and repair of hospitals" from $60,000,000 to $83,653,612.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 56, line 1, before the word "That," to strike out the word "Provided."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, line 17, after the word "contract," to strike out the word "Provided" and to insert the words "Provided further."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 58, after line 17, to insert:

Increase in Medical Department: That the Medical Department of the Regular Army be, and is hereby, increased by one assistant surgeon general, who shall have the rank of major general, and three assistant surgeons general, who shall have the rank of brigadier general, all of whom shall be appointed from the Medical Corps of the Regular Army.

That the President may nominate and appoint in the Medical Department of the National Army, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from the Medical Reserve Corps of the Regular Army not to exceed 4 major generals and 8 brigadier generals for each 1,000,000 officers and enlisted men of the entire National Army.

That the commissioned officers of the Medical Corps of the Regular Army, none of whom shall have rank above that of colonel, shall be proportionately distributed in the several grades as now provided by law.

That the commissioned officers of the Medical Reserve Corps of the Regular Army, none of whom shall have rank above that of colonel, shall be proportionately distributed in the several grades as now provided by law for the Medical Corps of the Navy.

That the President may designate as "consultants" officers of either the Medical Corps or the Medical Reserve Corps and may relieve them as the interests of the service may require: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be held or construed so as to discharge any officer of the Regular Army or deprive him of a commission which he now holds therein.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, while the bill was in the committee I had frequent occasion to confer with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the ranking minority member of the Military Affairs Committee, regarding legislation concerning the Medical Corps. I have not had an opportunity to examine the bill, and I should like to inquire from him what has been done in that respect.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the proposal to adopt for the Medical Corps of the Army the system governing the Medical Corps of the Navy was made to the Senate committee along with other suggestions, the one patterned after the naval system being the one most strongly urged. After long-continued hearings and investigation the subcommittee became satisfied, as the full committee later became satisfied, that the Medical Corps of the different branches of the Army should be divided. So far as the Regular Army is concerned, the legislation proposed simply adds one major general and three brigadier generals to the commissioned personnel of the Regular Army, and the remaining officers from colonels down may be increased from time to time according to the provisions of the present law and as the necessities of the case may require.

As to the National Army, the legislation provides that there may be, if the President so directs, four major generals and eight brigadier generals for every 1,000,000 officers and enlisted men in the service in the National Army. It provides also that the junior officers, from lieutenants up to and including colonels, may be in the same ratio as the law at present provides for the Navy.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I only want to take this opportunity in passing to express my gratification that provision has been made for the several Medical Corps of the Army. It is an act of justice to a body of men whose services in modern warfare are invaluable, as is conceded everywhere. I believe that the medical profession throughout the United States will appreciate the efforts of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], who was chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], and the other members of the Military Affairs Committee who have recommended the insertion of this provision in the bill. I sincerely hope that when the bill goes to conference the Senate conferees will insist on retaining this provision in the appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think I ought to say, further, that we have been very liberal indeed with the Medical Corps of the National Army. We have in that corps the most distinguished surgeons and physicians of this country or perhaps of the world; and it has seemed as if we might be liberal, since during the war they are giving to the Government their time and their experience, and, of course, at the end of the war these officers will be discharged, as are the enlisted men, except those who may be discharged in the meantime.

Now, as to the Regular Army, we ought not to interfere, and we have not in this legislation interfered, with what ought to be the rational flow of promotion in the service not only during the war but afterwards. This legislation, it is believed, will leave us at the end of the war with not too large a Medical Corps in the Regular Army, and the flow of promotions, while perhaps somewhat slower than heretofore, and of course very much slower than during the immediate past, will be normal, nevertheless.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to say in reference to this amendment rearranging the Medical Corps, and especially providing for the Medical Reserve Corps of the Army, that a good deal of labor has been devoted to this matter by the subcommittee and by the full committee. There are more than 20,000 doctors throughout this country who have volunteered to come into the service of the United States at this time. Doctors with large and remunerative practices have freely volunteered at, of course, very small pay in comparison with what they have heretofore made. No class of our citizens, I believe, have made greater sacrifices for the country than these gentlemen have voluntarily made. They have come forward with singular celerity, and have been most active in the performance of their duties and in preparing themselves for the duties that are before them. The best interests of our soldiers demand this legislation. It will give our Medical Corps such a position that it can enforce its reasonable rules to maintain the health of the Army and to restore the maimed and wounded. There was practically no legislation or very little legislation in regard to their service, and their commissions were limited for the most part to the rank of major and lesser grades.

There is no question that they are entitled to this legislation. So far as the general officers are concerned, they have even under this bill less representation than any other branch of the Army. I believe that, on the whole, this bill is satisfactory to them. I hope so, at any rate, because I believe, as I have said, that no class of our Army is more deserving of fair treatment than the officers of the Medical Reserve Corps who have come into the service of the United States. Some of the most noted physicians and surgeons of our land have not only come in recently, but have been in from the very beginning and are doing splendid work. It is a work that ought to be recognized by our country. This is the best that the committee could do; we believe that it is a proper provision and that it ought to be enacted into law.

We have taken much testimony and given much time and consideration to this measure. Senator WARREN, Senator NEW, and myself feel that we have taken every precaution to subserve the best interests of our soldiers in framing the measure. Substantially we have followed the provisions of Senator OWEN'S bill, and we are informed that the provisions of this bill as amended and reported on this subject are entirely satisfactory to the entire medical profession. It is the first time in the history of our Government when the medical fraternity has been recognized in a manner in keeping with the high purposes and the splendid efficiency of this noble profession.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I am gratified that the committee was able finally to agree upon such a provision as to give a substantial recognition both to the Medical Corps of the National Army and to the Medical Corps of the Regular Army. I have heretofore pointed out to the Senate the very great difference which prevailed between the American organization and the European organization. In Great Britain they have given very much more important recognition to the officers in the Medical Department, and the same thing is true with regard to France, Italy, Japan, and Austria. The reason why they have given a greater dignity to these officers is because of the fact that the saving of human life is involved; that is the purpose of it and not merely to give dignity to worthy men.

While the amendment reported by the committee does not provide anything like as large a number relatively of higher ranking officers as the British, the French, the Italians, the Austrians, and the Germans have, still I believe it will be a very useful improvement, and I am glad to welcome it.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I only want to say in conclusion and in passing that the provisions of this bill will at least lay the foundation for future legislation which may be required in the times to come. I agree with what the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has said. I do not think there is any element of our citizens who have made greater sacrifices than the members of the medical profession. A business man can come to Washington and devote all his time to the duties of some volunteer board and his business goes on, perhaps, under the management of those whom he leaves at home and his income is not curtailed, but the surgeon or physician who comes to Washington to serve on a volunteer board or to take a commission in very many cases sacrifices a very large professional income made by his own personal efforts, and when those efforts cease his income ceases. Therefore the sacrifice is all the greater.

I do not think, however, it is the money consideration which prompts this legislation; it is distinctly in the interest of greater efficiency in the several Medical Corps of the different branches of the Army. I know that in Pennsylvania—and the observation would apply, I take it, to any other State in the Union, but, of course, I am more familiar with my own State—the leading surgeons of Philadelphia and of Pittsburgh and throughout the State have contributed their services from a pure spirit of patriotism, and at almost a complete sacrifice of personal income and emolument. I know that this legislation will be commended throughout the country, and if it needs amplifying in the next appropriation bill I sincerely hope the Military Affairs Committee will see their way clear to build upon the foundation laid here to-day.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if anything that I said suggested to my distinguished friend that our first purpose was not to secure greater efficiency in the Medical Corps of the Army, then I did not express myself as carefully as I should, because, of course, that was the primary purpose of the committee in dealing with this matter.

I want also to add, Mr. President, that the Medical Corps of the Regular Army has done splendid work, as our committee has found out, and they are entitled to very great credit for the manner in which they have organized the entire medical forces of our Army. I do not think any branch of our service has shown greater efficiency in preparing for its part in this great conflict, and I want to congratulate this department on its splendid work up to date, and to express the belief that the Medical Corps of both Regular and Reserve Establishments will make historic records in this conflict.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Tennessee will not misunderstand me. I did not in the remotest way mean to suggest that he had intimated any consideration except that of the loftiest patriotism, and I want to say here that if it had not been for him and his colleagues on the subcommittee, supported by the Senator from Oklahoma, who introduced one of the original bills, this legislation might have failed for lack of attention in the multitude of other matters pressing upon the consideration of Congress and the committees of Congress at the present time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, under the subhead "Engineer Department," on page 64, to insert as a side heading: "Per diem allowance for traveling expenses."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 64, after line 17, to insert:

Bands for Engineer Corps: That the second paragraph of section 11 of chapter 134, Thirty-ninth Statutes, page 173, be, and the same hereby is, amended to read as follows:

Each regiment of Engineers shall consist of 1 colonel; 1 lieutenant colonel; 2 majors; 11 captains; 12 first lieutenants; 6 second lieutenants; 2 master engineers, senior grade; 1 regimental sergeant major; 2 regimental supply sergeants; 2 color sergeants; 1 sergeant bugler; 1 cook; 1 wagoner for each authorized wagon of the field and combat train; 1 band organized as are Infantry bands; and 2 battalions: Provided, That the present Engineer band shall be considered as one of the bands provided for above.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the next two subheads, "Equipment, maintenance, and training of foreign troops" and "Slavic legion," I ask to have temporarily passed over, because the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], who is the author of the second provision, wants to submit an amendment to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, that will be done.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 68, after line 21, to insert:

Pay of civilian employees in gun factories on leave of absence: That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and empowered, during the period of the war, to make payment, under such regulations as may be prescribed by him, in addition to and at the rate of pay now provided by law to each and all civilians employed by the War Department in gun factories and arsenals for work performed on all days of leave of absence granted by law to such employees.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 70, after line 4, to insert:

Medals of honor, distinguished-service crosses, and distinguished-service medals: That the provisions of existing law relating to the award of medals of honor to officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates of the Army be, and they hereby are, amended so that the President is authorized to present, in the name of the Congress, a medal of honor only to each person who, while an officer or enlisted man of the Army, shall hereafter, in action involving actual conflict with an enemy, distinguish himself conspicuously by gallantry and intrepidity at the risk of his life above and beyond the call of duty.

That the President be, and he is hereby, further authorized to present, but not in the name of Congress, a distinguished-service cross of appropriate design and a ribbon, together with a rosette or other device, to be worn in lieu thereof, to any person who, while serving in any capacity with the Army of the United States since the 6th day of April, 1917, has distinguished, or who shall hereafter distinguish, himself or herself by extraordinary heroism in connection with military operations against an armed enemy.

That the President be, and he is hereby, further authorized to present, but not in the name of Congress, a distinguished-service medal of appropriate design and a ribbon, together with a rosette or other device, to be worn in lieu thereof, to any person who, while serving in any capacity with the Army of the United States since the 6th day of April, 1917, has distinguished, or who hereafter shall distinguish, himself or herself by exceptionally meritorious service to the Government in a duty of great responsibility; and said distinguished-service medal shall also be issued to all enlisted men of the Army to whom the certificate of merit has been granted up to and including the date of the passage of this act under the provisions of previously existing law, in lieu of such certificate of merit, and after the passage of this act the award of the certificate of merit for distinguished service shall cease; and additional pay heretofore authorized by law for holders of the certificate of merit shall not be paid to them beyond the date of the award of the distinguished-service medal in lieu thereof as aforesaid.

That each enlisted man of the Army to whom there has been or shall be awarded a medal of honor, a distinguished-service cross, or a distinguished-service medal shall, for each such award, be entitled to additional pay at the rate of $2 per month from the date of the distinguished act or service on which the award is based, and each bar, or other suitable device, in lieu of a medal of honor, a distinguished-service cross, or a distinguished-service medal, as hereinafter provided for, shall entitle him to further additional pay at the rate of $2 per month from the date of the distinguished act or service for which the bar is awarded, and said additional pay shall continue throughout his active service, whether such service shall or shall not be continuous; but when the award is in lieu of the certificate of merit, as provided for in section 3 hereof, the additional pay shall begin with the date of the award.

That no more than one medal of honor or one distinguished-service cross or one distinguished-service medal shall be issued to any one person; but for each succeeding deed or act sufficient to justify the award of a medal of honor or a distinguished-service cross or a distinguished-service medal, respectively, the President may award a suitable bar, or other suitable device, to be worn as he shall direct; and for each other citation of an officer or enlisted man for gallantry in action published in orders issued from the headquarters of a force commanded by a general officer he shall be entitled to wear, as the President shall direct, a silver star three-sixteenths of an inch in diameter.

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend from the appropriations for contingent expenses of his department from time to time so much as may be necessary to defray the cost of the medals of honor, distinguished-service crosses, distinguished-service medals, bars, rosettes, and other devices hereinbefore provided for.

That whenever a medal, cross, bar, ribbon, rosette, or other device presented under the provisions of this act shall have been lost, destroyed, or rendered unfit for use, without fault or neglect on the part of the person to whom it was awarded, such medal, cross, bar, ribbon, rosette, or device shall be replaced without charge therefor.

That, except as otherwise prescribed herein, no medals of honor, distinguished-service cross, distinguished-service medal, or bar or other suitable device in lieu of either of said medals or of said cross, shall be issued to any person after more than three years from the date of the act justifying the award thereof, nor unless a specific statement or report distinctly setting forth the distinguished service and suggesting or recommending official recognition thereof shall have been made at the time of the distinguished service or within two years thereafter, nor unless it shall appear from the official records in the War Department that such person has so distinguished himself as to entitle him thereto; but in case an individual who shall distinguish himself dies before the making of the award to which he may be entitled, the award may nevertheless be made and the medal or cross or the bar or other emblem or device presented, within three years from the date of the act justifying the award thereof, to such representative of the deceased as the President may designate; but no medal, cross, bar, or other device, hereinbefore authorized, shall be awarded or presented to any individual whose entire service subsequently to the time he distinguished himself shall not have been honorable; but in cases of officers and enlisted men now in the Army for whom the award of the medal of honor has been recommended in full compliance with then-existing regulations but on account of services which, though insufficient fully to justify the award of the medal of honor, appear to have been such as to justify the award of the distinguished-service cross or distinguished-service medal hereinbefore provided for, such cases may be considered and acted upon under the provisions of this act authorizing the award of the distinguished-service cross and distinguished-service medal, notwithstanding that said services may have been rendered more than three years before said cases shall have been considered as authorized by this act, but all consideration of and action upon any of said cases shall be based exclusively upon official records now on file in the War Department; and in the cases of officers and enlisted men now in the Army who have been mentioned in orders, now a part of official records, for extraordinary heroism or especially meritorious services, such as to justify the award of the distinguished-service cross or the distinguished-service medal hereinbefore provided for, such cases may be considered and acted on under the provisions of this act, notwithstanding that said act or services may have been rendered more than three years before said cases shall have been considered as authorized by this act, but all consideration of and action upon any said cases shall be based exclusively upon official records of the War Department.

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to delegate, under such conditions, regulations, and limitations as he shall prescribe, to the commanding general of a separate army or higher unit in the field, the power conferred upon him by this act to award the medal of honor, the distinguished-service cross, and the distinguished-service medal; and he is further authorized to make from time to time any and all rules, regulations, and orders which he shall deem necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act and to execute the full purpose and intention thereof.

That American citizens who have received, since August 1, 1914, decorations or medals for distinguished service in the armies or in connection with the field service of those nations engaged in war against the Imperial German Government, shall, on entering the military service of the United States, be permitted to wear such medals or decorations.

That any and all members of the military forces of the United States serving in the present war be, and they are hereby, permitted and authorized to accept during the present war or within one year thereafter, from the Government of any of the countries engaged in war with any country with which the United States is or shall be concurrently likewise engaged in war, such decorations, when tendered, as are conferred by such Government upon the members of its own military forces; and the consent of Congress required therefor by clause 8 of section 9 of Article I of the Constitution is hereby expressly granted: Provided, That any officer or enlisted man of the military forces of the United States is hereby authorized to accept and wear any medal or decoration heretofore bestowed by the Government of any of the nations concurrently engaged with the United States in the present war.

That the President is authorized, under regulations to be prescribed by him, to confer such medals and decorations as may be authorized in the military service of the United States upon officers and enlisted men of the military forces of the countries concurrently engaged with the United States in the present war.

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to procure a bronze medal, with suitable device and ribbon, to be presented to each of the several officers and enlisted men, and families of such as may be dead, of the National Guard who, under the orders of the President of the United States, served on the Mexican border in the years 1916 and 1917, and who are not eligible to receive the Mexican service badge heretofore authorized by the President: Provided, That such medals shall not be issued to men who have, subsequent to such service, been dishonorably discharged from the service or deserted: And provided further, That the sum of $7,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying this last paragraph into effect.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Engineer Department," on page 78, to insert as a side heading: "Contract Obligations for Ordnance."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 78, after line 18, to strike out:

Provided further, That all material purchased under the appropriations for the Ordnance Department in this act shall be of American manufacture, except in cases when, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, it is to the manifest interest of the United States to make purchases abroad, which material shall be admitted free of duty.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 79, to insert:

Importation of certain war materials free of duty: That during the present emergency upon request made by the Secretary of War to the Secretary of the Treasury, and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, there may be imported into the United States without payment of duty thereon raw materials, parts or partly fabricated parts of equipment, and finished equipment required to hasten or facilitate the production of munitions or machinery of war whenever such duty would otherwise be payable directly or indirectly from appropriations for the support of the Army.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator a question in regard to that amendment. It seems to be a very sweeping one. Did the committee give that consideration?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The committee discussed it quite at length; but the provision was prepared in the War Department, and I think possibly originated in the Airplane Section. The Senator will notice that it only covers raw materials which could be used or would be used, part or partly fabricated parts of equipment, and finished equipment required to hasten or facilitate the production of munitions, machinery of war, and so forth. It was not the intention of the committee to extend it beyond that.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it will let in free nearly everything that comes into this country at the present time which to any great extent, directly or indirectly, enters into the manufacture of munitions and the production of machinery of war. This question came up before, and a similar amendment was offered to another bill, and finally it was decided that it would be better not to pass it, and it went out.

I ask the Senator if he will not allow this amendment to go over for the present? I want to read it carefully, and see just how far it goes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to that, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be temporarily passed over.

The next amendment was, on page 79, line 12, before the words "Chief of Ordnance," to strike out "The" and insert: "Civilian ordnance employees, District of Columbia: That the," so as to make the clause read:

Civilian ordnance employees, District of Columbia: That the Chief of Ordnance of the United States Army is authorized to employ in the District of Columbia, out of the appropriations made in this act for designing, procuring, caring for, and supplying ordnance and ordnance stores to the Army, such services, other than clerical, as are necessary for carrying out these purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 79, line 23, before the word "That," to strike out "Provided," so as to make the clause read:

That the appropriations hereinbefore made under the heading "Ordnance Department" shall be available for the payment of an allowance not to exceed $4 per day in lieu of subsistence to civilian employees of the Ordnance Department traveling on official business outside of the District of Columbia and away from their designated posts of duty.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "National Guard," on page 84, after line 15, to insert:

Longevity pay for men other than the Regular Army: That officers and enlisted men of the forces of the Army of the United States other than the Regular Army who have had service in the National Guard and Organized Militia of any State, Territory, or District, but who have entered the service in the forces of the Army of the United States, otherwise than through draft under the provisions of section 111 of the act of June 3, 1916, known as the national defense act, shall be upon the same footing as to pay and allowance as the members of said forces who were drafted under the provisions of said section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Civilian military training," on page 86, line 16, to insert as a side heading, "Arms and ordnance equipment," so as to make the clause read:

Arms and ordnance equipment: For arms and ordnance equipment, including overhauling and repairing of personal equipments, machine-gun outfits, horse equipment; ammunition, targets, and other accessories for target practice, and for overhauling and repairing arms for issue and use in connection with training camps for civilians in pursuance of the provisions of section 54 of the act approved June 3, 1916, $250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 87, line 5, after the word "act," to strike out "of Congress" and insert "entitled 'An act to authorize the issue to States and Territories and the District of Columbia of rifles and other property for the equipment of organizations of Home Guards,'" so as to make the clause read:

Ordnance equipment for Home Guard organizations: For procuring arms, including pistols, ammunition, equipment, etc., for issue and use in connection with Home Guard organizations in pursuance of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to authorize the issue to States and Territories and the District of Columbia of rifles and other property for the equipment of organizations of Home Guards," approved June 14, 1917, authorizing issues to Home Guard organizations, $2,500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 89, line 5, before the word "That," to strike out "Provided" and insert as a side heading "Printing and binding"; in line 9, before the word "Provided," to strike out "And provided further," so as to read:

Printing and binding: That the appropriations herein made for the support of the Army and the National Guard are available for such printing, binding, and blank books as may be necessary in putting in effect the objects of the appropriations: Provided, That printing, binding, and blank books required for use outside of the District of Columbia in connection with the support of the Army and the National Guard may be done or procured elsewhere than at the Government Printing Office when in the opinion of the Secretary of War such work can be more advantageously done or procured locally, the cost thereof to be paid from the proper appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 90, to insert:

Purchase of real estate for military purposes: That in all cases where appropriations have heretofore been, or shall hereafter be, made for the expenditures of any department, corps, or bureau incurred in connection with the national security and defense, and in the administration thereof for the purpose specified therein it becomes necessary in the opinion of the head of such department, corps, or bureau to acquire real estate, or some right, title, or interest therein, and any buildings and improvements thereon, it shall be lawful, by and with the approval of the President, to acquire the same by purchase, lease, donation, or condemnation, or by any other means provided by law for such acquisition, and out of the appropriations aforesaid to meet the expenses of such acquisition, including the purchase price, or rent of the land, and the buildings and improvements thereon, or the damages allowed to the owner or owners as compensation therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 90, after line 17, to insert:

Leon Springs Military Reservation, Tex.: That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $316,941 for the acquisition of land as an addition to the Leon Springs Military Reservation, Tex.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I will ask the chairman of the committee if he does not want to insert there a provision for the recovery of the rent paid as per contract?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I understood that the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] was to prepare that amendment, and that it would be offered here.

Mr. WARREN. I think it had better be passed over, then.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; I think so, too.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the amendment in lines 18 to 22, page 90, will be passed over.

The next amendment was, on page 90, after line 22, to insert:

Bertram T. Clayton, jr.: That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Bertram T. Clayton, jr., late a cadet of the United States Military Academy at West Point, to the position of second lieutenant of Infantry of the Army, and to place him upon the retired list with the pay of a retired second lieutenant of Infantry.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, may I inquire from the chairman of the committee the reason for this specific amendment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] is personally acquainted with the conditions surrounding this young man. The placing of his name in an amendment on the appropriation bill for the support of the Military Academy was suggested once before and it was defeated. Since that time the father of this young man, who is still ill, has been killed in the trenches on the French front.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I shall be glad to explain this particular case.

This young man was appointed to the Military Academy. He was examined by the United States authorities, and when he went into the academy he was in perfect health, or he would not have been admitted there. After he had been in training at the academy he contracted tuberculosis and was sent by the Government out West for treatment, where he has remained since that time. The time for his graduation has passed. He is in a condition of real extremity. He never will get well; and the committee thought, after careful consideration and much argument, that this legislation should be adopted. There are at least two precedents for it. I know of two cases that have been treated in a similar way in the past. I have not the names of the two young men who were so treated by Congress in the past.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Keough was one.

Mr. McKELLAR. Keough was one, and I forget the name of the other. I may have it in my pocket. At all events it is a case which, when you know the facts, appeals to you very much, and in my judgment the amendment should be adopted. It is as little as we can do for the young man to do our duty toward him in this way. It is the only way in which it can be done. His trouble was contracted while he was in the service of the United States. There are precedents for this action. The case is in every sense a deserving one. He is a young man of high character and has never done anything to forfeit fair treatment at the hands of his Government, to which he had dedicated his life.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I am in accord with the amendment. I was anxious to have the explanation in the RECORD. I know this boy, and have known him since he was a child. He was born near my home in New York City. His father was commanding officer of a New York regiment during the Spanish War. After the war he retired from the Army and served in the House of Representatives. Subsequently he went back in the Army, and, as the Senator from Tennessee has said, he met his death with the rank of colonel the other day with our Army on the western front in France. The father was a splendid gentleman and a gallant soldier, and the boy is a fine lad, and I think it is to be regretted that the country has lost his services in the Army.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not know the young man, but I have known the father well and intimately for many years. He was born in the same State in which I was born—the State of Alabama. His father, Bertram T. Clayton, sr., was one of the best officers in the Army. I have known of his service for quite a while. A part of the time he was stationed at the West Point Academy, where he made a most efficient officer in the commissary department. He could have remained in that line of service if he had wanted to. If he had been of the kind that would have liked an easy time, he could have remained in that branch of the service and remained in a place of safety. Instead of that the father chose to go to France in the service of his country, in that part of the Army engaged in active and dangerous service, and unfortunately he was killed in France only a few days ago. Of course, this case rests on its merits, but it can be said, in passing, that there never was a finer man or braver soldier than the father of this young man—the father who has just offered up his life on the bloody battle fields of France as a sacrifice for America and her ideals. The life of Col. Bertram T. Clayton was in deed and in truth a noble sacrifice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 91, after line 4, to insert:

Appropriations available for obligations heretofore incurred: The appropriations contained herein shall be available for the payment of obligations on account of the existing emergency incurred prior to the passage of this act or prior to June 30, 1918, and which are properly chargeable to such appropriations, and same are hereby made immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 91, to insert as a subhead "Chapter II."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 91, line 13, to insert as a side heading "Aberdeen Proving Ground."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 91, to insert as a subhead "Chapter III."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 91, line 24, to insert as a side heading "Accountability for trust funds."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 92, after line 7, to insert:

CHAPTER IV.

Payments from total available balances: That during the present emergency when pressing obligations are required to be paid by a disbursing officer of the Army and there is an insufficient balance to his official credit, under the proper appropriation or appropriations for the purpose, he is authorized to make payments from the total available balance to his official credit, provided sufficient funds under proper appropriation or appropriations have been apportioned by the chief officer of the bureau or department for the expenditure. When such disbursements are made, the accounts of the disbursing officer shall show the charging of the proper appropriations, the balances under which will be adjusted by the disbursing officer on receipt of funds, or by the accounting officers of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 92, after line 22, to insert:

CHAPTER V.

Army Nurse Corps: That the Nurse Corps (female) of the Medical Department of the Army shall hereafter be known as the Army Nurse Corps and shall consist of one superintendent, who shall be a graduate of a hospital-training school having a course of instruction of not less than two years; of as many chief nurses, nurses, and reserve nurses as may from time to time be needed and prescribed or ordered by the Secretary of War, and, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, of not exceeding six assistant superintendents, and, for each Army or separate military force beyond the continental limits of the United States, one director and not exceeding two assistant directors of nursing service, all of whom shall be graduates of hospital-training schools and shall have passed such professional, moral, mental, and physical examinations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That the superintendent shall be appointed by and, at his discretion, be removed by the Secretary of War; that all other members of said corps shall be appointed by and, at his discretion, be removed by the Surgeon General, by and with the approval of the Secretary of War; but the assistant superintendents, the directors, the assistant directors, and the chief nurses shall be appointed by promotion from other members of the corps, and shall, upon being relieved from duty as such, unless removed for incompetency or misconduct, revert to the grades in the corps from which they were promoted.

SEC. 3. That the annual rate of pay of the members of said corps shall be as follows: Superintendent, $2,400; assistant superintendents and directors, $2,000; assistant directors, $1,800; chief nurses, $360 in addition to the pay of a nurse; nurses, $780 for the first period of three years' service, $840 for the second period of three years' service, $900 for the third period of three years' service, $960 for the fourth period of three years' service, and $1,020 after 12 years' service in said corps (including in all cases time of service as contract nurse); reserve nurses, when upon active duty, will receive the same pay as nurses who have served in the corps for periods corresponding to the full period of their active service; and all members of said corps, in addition to the foregoing, the sum of $10 per month when serving beyond the continental limits of the United States (excepting Porto Rico and Hawaii).

SEC. 4. That members of said Nurse Corps who shall have had active service therein of 20 years (including for the purpose of computation time of service as contract nurse) shall, upon application therefor to the Secretary of War, be placed upon a retired list and shall thereafter receive 75 per cent of the pay, exclusive of foreign-service pay, they were drawing at the time they became entitled to retirement as aforesaid.

SEC. 5. That members of said Nurse Corps shall be entitled to cumulative leave of absence with pay at the rate of 30 days for each calendar year of service in said corps, not exceeding, however, 120 days at one time, and in addition thereto sick leave not exceeding 30 days in any one calendar year in case of illness or injury incurred in the line of duty.

SEC. 6. That members of said Nurse Corps shall receive transportation and necessary expenses when traveling under orders, and such allowances of quarters and subsistence and, during illness, such medical care as may be prescribed in regulations by the Secretary of War; and when at places where no public quarters are available, commutation in lieu thereof, and of heat and light therefor at such rates and upon such conditions as are now or shall hereafter be provided by law.

SEC. 7. That section 19 of chapter 192 of Thirty-first Statutes, page 753; chapter 50 of Thirty-seventh Statutes, page 72; that part of the act approved August 24, 1912 (37 Stats., p. 575), providing for allowances, subsistence, and medical care during illness for the superintendent of the Nurse Corps; and that part of the act approved March 23, 1910 (36 Stats., p. 249), prescribing the pay of the superintendent and members of the Nurse Corps, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 96, after line 3, to insert:

CHAPTER VI.

Claims of enlisted men for loss of private property: That the act entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of officers and enlisted men of the Army, for loss of private property destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1885 (ch. 335, 23 Stats., p. 350), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 1. That private property belonging to officers, enlisted men, and members of the Nurse Corps (female) of the Army, including all prescribed articles of equipment and clothing which they are required by law or regulations to own and use in the performance of their duties, and horses and equipment required by law or regulations to be provided by mounted officers, which since the 5th day of April, 1917, has been or shall hereafter be lost, damaged, or destroyed in the military service shall be replaced, or the damage thereto or its value recouped to the owner as hereinafter provided, when such loss, damage, or destruction has occurred or shall hereafter occur in any of the following circumstances:

"First. When such loss or destruction was without fault or negligence on the part of the owner.

"Second. When such private property so lost or destroyed was shipped on board an unseaworthy vessel by order of an officer authorized to give such order or direct such shipment.

"Third. When it appears that such private property was so lost or destroyed in consequence of its owner having given his attention to the saving of property belonging to the United States which was in danger at the same time and in similar circumstances.

"Fourth. When during travel under orders the regulation allowance of baggage transferred by a common carrier is lost or damaged; but replacement or recoupment in these circumstances shall be limited to the extent of such loss or damage over and above the amount recoverable from said carrier.

"Fifth. When such private property is destroyed or captured by the enemy, or is destroyed to prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy, or is abandoned on account of lack of transportation or by reason of military emergency requiring its abandonment, or is otherwise lost in the field during campaign.

"SEC. 2. That, except as to such property as by law or regulations is required to be possessed and used by officers, enlisted men, and members of the Nurse Corps (female), respectively, the liability of the Government under this chapter shall be limited to damage to or loss of such articles of personal property as the Secretary of War shall decide or declare to be reasonable, useful, necessary, and proper for officers, enlisted men, or members of the Nurse Corps (female), respectively, as the case may be, while in quarters, engaged in the public service, in the line of duty.

"SEC. 3. That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to examine into, ascertain, and determine the value of the property lost, destroyed, captured, or abandoned as specified in the foregoing sections, or the amount of the damage thereto, as the case may be; and the amount of such value or damage so ascertained and determined shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That in time of war or of operations during public disaster such property lost, destroyed, captured, or abandoned, or so damaged as to be unfit for service, shall be replaced in kind from Government property on hand, or adequate commutation given therefor when replacement in kind can not be made, or can not be made within a reasonable time, by the supply officer or quartermaster of the organization to which the person entitled thereto belongs or with which he is serving upon the order of the commanding officer thereof.

"SEC. 4. That the tender of replacement or of commutation or the determination made by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury upon a claim presented as provided for in the foregoing section shall constitute a final determination of any claim cognizable under this chapter, and such claim shall not thereafter be reopened or considered.

"SEC. 5. That no claim arising under this chapter shall be considered unless made within two years from the time that it accrued, except that when a claim accrues in time of war, or when war intervenes within two years after its accrual, such claim may be presented within two years after peace is established."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 99, after line 12, to insert:

CHAPTER VII.

Suspending restrictions in purchase of military supplies: That so much of section 1133 of the Revised Statutes, and of section 9 of the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, as restricts the purchase and distribution of military stores and supplies to officers of the Quartermaster Corps be, and the same is hereby, suspended for the period of the present war.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 99, after line 23, to insert:

CHAPTER VIII.

Care of persons discharged from the military service: That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered to make provision for such care and treatment as he may deem advisable of persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States on account of physical disability who are citizens of any nation at war with a nation with which the United States is at war; but such provision shall be made only for the citizens of a nation that makes suitable provision for the care and treatment of persons discharged from the military or naval forces on account of physical disability who are citizens of the United States: Provided, That such care and treatment shall in no case exceed the care and treatment authorized by law and regulations for members of the Army and Navy of the United States discharged from the military or naval service for like cause.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 100, after line 15, to insert:

CHAPTER IX.

Army mine planter service: That hereafter there shall be in the Coast Artillery Corps of the Regular Army a service to be known as the Army mine planter service, which shall consist, for each mine planter in the service of the United States, of one master, one first mate, one second mate, one chief engineer, and one assistant engineer, who shall be warrant officers appointed by and holding their offices at the discretion of the Secretary of War, and two oilers, four firemen, four deck hands, one cook, one steward, and one assistant steward, who shall be appointed from enlisted men of the Coast Artillery Corps under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe: Provided, That the Coast Artillery Corps is hereby increased by such numbers of warrant officers and enlisted men as may be necessary to constitute the force provided by this chapter: Provided further, That the annual pay of the warrant officers and enlisted men in the various grades established by this chapter shall be as follows: Masters, $1,800; first mates, $1,320; second mates, $972; chief engineers, $1,700; assistant engineers, $1,200; oilers, $432; firemen, $396; deck hands, $216; cooks, $360; steward, $540; assistant stewards, $288: And provided further, That warrant officers shall have such allowances as the Secretary of War may prescribe, and shall be retired, and shall receive longevity pay, as now provided by law for officers of the Army, and that the enlisted force herein provided for shall receive the allowances and continuous-service pay now provided by law for enlisted men of the Army: And provided further, That in computing length of service for retirement, and in computing longevity pay for warrant officers and continuous-service pay for the enlisted men authorized by this chapter, service on boats in the service of the Quartermaster Department or the Quartermaster Corps prior to the passage of this act shall be counted: And provided further, That during the continuation of the present emergency all enlisted men of the mine planter service of the Army of the United States in active service whose base pay does not exceed $21 per month shall receive an increase of $15 per month; those whose base pay is $24, an increase of $12 per month; those whose base pay is $30, $33, $36, or $40, an increase of $8 per month; and those whose base pay is $45 or more, an increase of $6 per month: And provided further, That the increases of pay herein authorized shall not enter into the computation of continuous-service pay.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 102, after line 10, to insert:

Chapter X.

Amending the Articles of War: That articles 52, 53, 57, and 112 of section 1342 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act entitled, "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," approved August 29, 1916, be, and the same are hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Art. 52. Suspension of sentences: The authority competent to order the execution of the sentence of a court-martial may, at the time of the approval of such sentence, suspend the execution, in whole or in part, of any such sentence as does not extend to death, and may restore the person under sentence to duty during such suspension. A sentence, or any part thereof, which has been so suspended may be remitted, in whole or in part, except in cases of persons confined in the United States Disciplinary Barracks or its branches, by the officer who suspended the same, by his successor in office, or by any officer exercising appropriate court-martial jurisdiction over the command in which the person under sentence may be serving at the time, and, subject to the foregoing exception, the same authority may vacate the order of suspension at any time and order the execution of the sentence or the suspended part thereof in so far as the same shall not have been previously remitted. The death or honarble discharge of a person under suspended sentence shall operate as a complete remission of any unexecuted or unremitted part of such sentence.

"Art. 53 Execution or remission—Confinement in disciplinary barracks: When a sentence of dishonorable discharge has been suspended until the soldier's release from confinement, the execution or remission of any part of his sentence shall, if the soldier be confined in the United States Disciplinary Barracks, or any branch thereof, be directed by the Secretary of War."

"Art. 57. False returns—Omission to render returns: Every officer commanding a regiment, an independent troop, battery, or company, or a garrison shall, in the beginning of every month, transmit through the proper channels, to the Department of War, an exact return of the same. Every officer whose duty it is to render to the War Department or other superior authority a return of the state of the troops under his command, or of the arms, ammunitions, clothing, funds, or other property thereunto belonging, who knowingly makes a false return thereof shall be dismissed from the service and suffer such other punishment as a court-martial may direct. And any officer who, through neglect or design, omits to render such return shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

"Art. 112. Effects of deceased persons—Disposition of: In case of the death of any person subject to military law, the commanding officer of the place of command will permit the legal representative or widow of the deceased, if present, to take possession of all his effects then in camp or quarters, and if no legal representative or widow be present, the commanding officer shall direct a summary court to secure all such effects; and said summary court shall have authority to collect and receive any debts due decedent's estate by local debtors; and as soon as practicable after the collection of such effects said summary court shall transmit such effects; and any money collected, through the Quartermaster Department, at Government expense, to the widow or legal representative of the deceased, if such be found by said court, or to his son, daughter, father, mother, brother, or sister, in the order named, if such be found by said court, or to the beneficiary named by the deceased, if such be found by said court, and such court shall thereupon make to the War Department a full report of its transactions; but if there be none of the persons hereinabove named, or such persons or their addresses are not known to or readily ascertainable by said court, and the court shall so find, said summary court shall have authority to convert into cash, by public or private sale, not earlier than 30 days after the death of the deceased, all effects of the deceased, except sabers, insignia, decorations, medals, watches, trinkets, manuscripts, and other articles valuable chiefly as keepsakes; and as soon as practicable after converting such effects into cash said summary court shall deposit with the proper officer, to be designated in regulations, any cash belonging to decedent's estate, and shall transmit a receipt for such deposits, any will or other papers of value belonging to the deceased, any sabers, insignia, decorations, medals, watches, trinkets, manuscripts, and other articles valuable chiefly as keepsakes, together with an inventory of the effects secured by said summary court, and a full account of its transactions to the War Department for transmission to the Auditor for the War Department for action as authorized by law in the settlement of the accounts of deceased officers and enlisted men of the Army.

"The provisions of this article shall be applicable to inmates of the United States Soldiers' Home who die in any United States military hospital outside of the District of Columbia where sent from the home for treatment."

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may ask the chairman of the committee a question, this bill was only reported to-day, and I have not had an opportunity to read it. Does this bill provide for raising and lowering the age limit for soldiers who may be drafted into the service?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No, Mr. President. The only change in the age is in the Staff Corps. The bill raises the age limit from 30 to 55 years for service in the Staff Corps, in order that men who are perfectly capable of discharging duties as clerks in the Staff Corps can serve, although they are not fit for military duty. That is the only change made.

Mr. POMERENE. Will that other legislation be presented in the form of another bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I understand that there is an amendment of that kind to be proposed to this bill, and it will probably come up in the course of the discussion this afternoon.

Mr. POMERENE. During this afternoon?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think so.

Mr. REED. I wish to refer to chapter X, page 102. It reads:

The authority competent to order the execution of the sentence of a court-martial may at the time of the approval of such sentence suspend the execution in whole or in part of any such sentence as does not extend to death.

I have had no opportunity to examine this bill. Does not the bill, if it is adopted in this form, leave it so that a death sentence could not be suspended?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It could be suspended by the Commander in Chief of the Army, but not by the authority that imposed the death sentence. That part of the law is exactly as it has always been.

Mr. REED. Is it proposed that when a court-martial shall impose a sentence upon a man the court-martial may suspend its own sentence?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; it is the authority competent to order the court-martial.

Mr. REED. Who is that authority?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The commanding officer of the district or the Secretary of War.

Mr. REED. Should not the Secretary of War have authority to direct a suspension of the death sentence?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The President has recently suspended two or three sentences in cases where young men were ordered to be shot.

Mr. REED. Certainly, the President has that authority.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. He is the only authority that has it now.

Mr. REED. This is the point I have in mind. I do not want to be captious. If I had had any opportunity to examine the bill, I would have presented this question elsewhere. By implication might this not leave it so that the right to suspend a death sentence would be taken away? It is a notice, if we undertake to deal now legislatively with the subject of suspending sentences, and we confer a very broad power of suspension, that we expressly except from that power the death penalty. Without having an opportunity to examine the old law as it stands it seems to me that there may be danger in this phraseology and that it ought to be modified. I am not willing that this section shall be passed in this form until I have had some opportunity to examine it. I ask that section 52 be allowed to lie over.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The whole chapter X then goes over. It is all one amendment.

Mr. REED. I do not understand that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It reads:

That articles 52, 53, 57, and 112 of section 1342 of the Revised Statutes of the United States—

And so forth—

be * * * amended to read as follows.

If any part of it goes over, it all goes over.

Mr. REED. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Chapter X goes over.

The next amendment was, on page 106, after line 4, to insert:

CHAPTER XI.

Method of determining quotas for military service: That in the determination of quotas for the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, or subdivisions thereof, to be raised for military service under the terms of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, the provisions of the joint resolution approved May 16, 1918, providing for the calling into military service of certain classes of persons registered and liable for military service under the said act, shall apply to any or all forces heretofore or hereafter raised under the provisions of said act for any State, Territory, District, or subdivision thereof, from and after the time when such State, Territory, District, or subdivision thereof has completed or completes its quota of forces called and furnished under the President's proclamation dated July 12, 1917.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. After line 23, page 106, insert:

But credit shall be given on its quotas to any State, Territory, District, or subdivision thereof for the number of men who have entered the military or naval service of the United States from any such State, Territory, District, or subdivision thereof since May 1, 1917, including members of the National Guard who were in the Federal service on that date.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. May I suggest to the chairman of the committee that this matter be passed over with the others?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It may be passed over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be passed over. Chapter XI will go over.

The next amendment was, on page 106, after line 23, to insert:

CHAPTER XII.

Raising the age limit for volunteer duty in the Staff Corps: That the first sentence of section 7 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That the qualifications and conditions for voluntary enlistment as herein provided shall be the same as those prescribed by existing law for enlistments in the Regular Army, except that recruits for service in the Staff Corps and departments may be accepted who are between the ages of 41 and 55 years, both inclusive, at the time of their enlistment, and that all other recruits must be between the ages of 18 and 40 years, both inclusive, at the time of their enlistment; and such enlistment shall be for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged."

Mr. REED. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee why the age limit of physicians could not as well be raised? The suggestion has been made to me by physicians that physicians above the age of 55 might well be employed in hospitals in this country. There is going to be, perhaps, a shortage of medical talent, and even if physicians are not physically able to enter the foreign service, they might be employed in this country up to the age of 60. I ask the chairman of the committee what he thinks of that proposition?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am rather in accord with the views of the Senator. I think 55 is the age limit for physicians and surgeons.

Mr. WARREN. No; 62 in the Navy and 64 in the Army.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was thinking that it was 55.

Mr. REED. I inquired of the chairman if this clause did not cover physicians.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It was not intended to cover physicians. I do not think it does.

Mr. REED. Then my inquiry was not understood by the chairman of the committee. I simply withdraw the suggestion at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 107, after line 15, to insert:

CHAPTER XIII.

Prohibiting prostitution near cantonments: That section 13 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows, subject to the same modifications as prescribed in the act approved October 6, 1917:

SEC. 13. That during the present emergency it shall be unlawful, within such reasonable distance of any military camp, station, fort, post, cantonment, training or mobilization place as the Secretary of War shall determine to be needful to the efficiency and welfare of the Army, and shall designate and publish in general orders or bulletins, to engage in prostitution or to aid or abet prostitution or to procure or solicit for purposes of prostitution, or to keep or set up a house of ill fame, brothel, or bawdy house, or to receive any person for purposes of lewdness, assignation, or prostitution into any vehicle, conveyance, place, structure, or building, or to permit any person to remain for purposes of lewdness, assignation, or prostitution in any vehicle, conveyance, place, structure, or building; and any person, corporation, partnership, or association violating the provisions of this chapter shall, unless otherwise punishable under the Articles of War, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and any person subject to military law violating this chapter shall be punished as provided by the Articles of War; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, empowered, and directed to do everything by him deemed necessary to suppress and prevent violation thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 109, to insert:

CHAPTER XIV.

Interdepartmental social hygiene board: That there is hereby created a board to be known as the interdepartmental social hygiene board, to consist of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Treasury as ex officio members, and of the Surgeon General of the Army, the Surgeon General of the Navy, and the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, or of representatives designated by the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Treasury, respectively. The duties of the board shall be: (1) To recommend rules and regulations for the expenditure of moneys allotted to the States under section 5 of this chapter; (2) to select the institutions and organizations and fix the allotments to each institution under said section 5; (3) to recommend to the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy such general measures as will promote correlation and efficiency in carrying out the purposes of this chapter by their respective departments; and (4) to direct the expenditure of the sum of $100,000 referred to in the last paragraph of section 7 of this chapter. The board shall meet at least quarterly, and shall elect annually one of its members as chairman, and shall adopt rules and regulations for the conduct of its business.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are hereby authorized and directed to adopt measures for the purpose of assisting the various States in caring for civilian persons whose detention, isolation, quarantine, or commitment to institutions may be found necessary for the protection of the military and naval forces of the United States against venereal diseases.

SEC. 3. That there is hereby established in the Bureau of the Public Health Service a division of venereal diseases, to be under the charge of a commissioned medical officer of the United States Public Health Service detailed by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, which officer while thus serving shall be an assistant surgeon general of the Public Health Service, subject to the provisions of law applicable to assistant surgeons general in charge of administrative divisions in the District of Columbia of the Bureau of the Public Health Service. There shall be in such division such assistants, clerks, investigators, and other employees as may be necessary for the performance of its duties and as may be provided for by law.

SEC. 4. That the duties of the division of venereal diseases shall be in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury (1) to study and investigate the cause, treatment, and prevention of venereal diseases; (2) to cooperate with State boards or departments of health for the prevention and control of such diseases within the States; and (3) to control and prevent the spread of these diseases in interstate traffic: Provided, That nothing in this chapter shall be construed as limiting the functions and activities of other departments or bureaus in the prevention, control, and treatment of venereal diseases and in the expenditure of moneys therefor.

SEC. 5. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000,000, to be expended under the joint direction of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to carry out the provisions of section 2 of this chapter. Provided, That the appropriation herein made shall not be deemed exclusive, but shall be in addition to other appropriations of a more general character which are applicable to the same or similar purposes.

SEC. 6. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,400,000 annually for two fiscal years, beginning with the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1918, to be apportioned as follows: The sum of $1,000,000, which shall be paid to the States for the use of their respective boards or departments of health in the prevention, control, and treatment of venereal diseases; this sum to be allotted to each State, in accordance with the rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, in the proportion which its population bears to the population of the continental United States, exclusive of Alaska and the Canal Zone, according to the last preceding United States census, and such allotment to be so conditioned that for each dollar paid to any State the State shall specifically appropriate or otherwise set aside an equal amount for the prevention, control, and treatment of venereal diseases, except for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, for which the allotment of money is not conditioned upon the appropriation or setting aside of money by the State, provided that any State may obtain any part of its allotment for any fiscal year subsequent to June 30, 1919, by specifically appropriating or otherwise setting aside an amount equal to such part of its allotment for the prevention, control, and treatment of venereal diseases; the sum of $100,000, which shall be paid to such universities, colleges, or other suitable institutions, as in the judgement of the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board are qualified for scientific research, for the purpose of discovering, in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board, more effective medical measures in the prevention and treatment of venereal diseases; the sum of $300,000, which shall be paid to such universities, colleges, or other suitable institutions or organizations, as in the judgment of the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board are qualified for scientific research, for the purpose of discovering and developing more effective educational measures in the prevention of venereal diseases, and for the purpose of sociological and psychological research related thereto.

SEC. 7. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $300,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, to be apportioned as follows: The sum of $200,000 to defray the expenses of the establishment and maintenance of the Division of Venereal Diseases in the Bureau of the Public Health Service; and the sum of $100,000 to be used under the direction of the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board for any purpose for which any of the appropriations made by this chapter are available.

SEC. 8. That the terms "State" and "States," as used in this chapter, shall be held to include the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 113, after line 19, to insert:

CHAPTER XV.

Authorizing the President to commandeer timber: That during the period of the present war the President is hereby authorized and empowered within the limits of amounts heretofore or hereafter appropriated therefor—

First. To take possession of any standing or fallen timber required for use by the Army, Navy, or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, or required in the production of any article necessary for use by the Army, Navy, or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation.

Second. To enter upon any lands, including Indian and military reservations and forest reserves, on which is situated any such standing or fallen timber so required, and to cut, remove, and appropriate such timber therefrom, also to enter upon and occupy any other lands or premises required in cutting or removing such standing or fallen timber; to erect and maintain such machinery, appliances, and temporary structures upon any portion of said lands as may be necessary for the accomplishment of any of said purposes, and to remove the same; to construct and maintain such roads and logging railroads across and over said lands as may be required for rapid cutting, removal, or appropriation of such timber, and to operate such logging railroads and remove all rails and equipment thereof.

Third. To take possession of and use any logs or manufactured lumber or other timber products, and all machinery, cables, rails, equipment, and appliances of every character and description necessary for the production of logs, as may be required for use by the Army, Navy, or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation: Provided, That a reasonable supply of logs shall always be left with any mill conducting its own logging operations to insure its continued operation as a sawmill.

SEC. 2. That it shall be lawful for the President to commit to any existing department or agency of the Government designated by him for that purpose the exercise of the powers granted by section 1 of this chapter: Provided, That when it shall become necessary for the military needs of this Government to enter upon any Indian or military reservation, or any other Government or private property, for the purposes provided in this chapter, all operations shall be conducted and controlled under rules and regulations having due regard for conservation, forestation, fire protection, and any and all other rules as shall be prescribed by the Forestry Division of the United States Department of Agriculture.

SEC. 3. That whenever any standing or fallen timber or any logs or manufactured lumber or other timber products shall be taken possession of by the President, or under his authority by virtue of the provisions of this chapter, and whenever any lands or premises shall be entered upon or occupied by virtue hereof, just compensation shall be made to the owner, which compensation shall be determined by or under the direction of the President, and if the amount thereof is unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by or under the direction of the President, and shall be entitled to sue the United States and recover such further sum as added to said 75 per cent shall make up such amount as will be just compensation therefor, in the manner provided for by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code.

SEC. 4. That the President is hereby authorized, during the period of the present war, in so far as may be necessary to insure an adequate supply of lumber and timber products required by the Army, Navy, and the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, to issue and enforce orders to persons engaged in logging operations prescribing the length of logs which shall be cut in the course of such operations; and to issue orders to persons engaged in lumbering and in operating sawmills prescribing the dimensions of lumber and timber products which shall be manufactured in the course of such operations: Provided, That no such persons engaged in operating sawmills shall be required to saw lumber or timber products except of such dimensions as said sawmills may, at the time of such order, be equipped to produce.

SEC. 5. That any person who shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this chapter or any order of the President issued under the authority of section 4 hereof shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall for each violation be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator from Oregon, having charge of the bill, whether the provisions of the bill respecting the commandeering of timber are the same as those found in the bill which recently passed this body?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. This is exactly the bill as it passed the Senate and went to the House, and was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and has not been reported out.

Mr. KING. There is no extension of the powers of the Government?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; it is exactly as it passed the Senate. I do not know whether the conferees of the House will agree to it. We had quite a little discussion about it when we had a conference with Mr. DENT and Mr. KAHN, but I hope if this is put in by the Senate we may reach some sort of an agreement about it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 117, after line 5, to insert:

CHAPTER XVI.

Aircraft Production Corporation: That the Director of Aircraft Production may, whenever in his judgment to do so will facilitate and expedite the production of aircraft, aircraft equipment, or materials therefor, for the United States and Governments allied with it in the prosecution of the present war, form under the laws of the District of Columbia or under the laws of any State one or more corporations for the purchase, production, manufacture, and sale of aircraft, aircraft equipment, or materials therefor, and to build, own, and operate railroads in connection therewith. The total capital stock of the corporation or corporations so formed, together with any bonds, notes, debentures, or other securities issued by them, shall not at any one time exceed $100,000,000.

SEC. 2. That the Director of Aircraft Production may, for and on behalf of the United States, subscribe, purchase, and vote not less than a majority of the voting capital stock of any such corporation, and may purchase for and on behalf of the United States all or any part of the preferred nonvoting stock, bonds, notes, debentures, or other securities issued by such corporations, and do all things necessary to protect the interest of the United States and to carry out the purpose of this chapter; and, with the approval of the Secretary of War, may sell any or all of the stock, bonds, notes, debentures, or other securities of the United States in such corporation: Provided, That at no time shall the United States be a minority holder of voting stock therein. Any sums heretofore or hereafter appropriated for the purchase or procurement of aircraft, aircraft equipment, or materials therefor, for the Army shall be available for the purchase of the capital stock of such corporation or corporations or their bonds, notes, debentures, or other securities.

SEC. 3. That within one year from the signing of a treaty of peace with the Imperial German Government the Director of Aircraft Production shall, on behalf of the United States as a stockholder, institute such proceedings as are necessary to dissolve such corporation or corporations under the laws of the District of Columbia or the State or States under which such corporation or corporations are organized. Upon the dissolution of the corporation or corporations the same shall be liquidated and the assets distributed in accordance with the laws of the District of Columbia or the State or States under which such corporation or corporations are organized.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to assign for duty, under the direction of the Director of Aircraft Production, any enlisted men or commissioned officers, from time to time, in the military organization as he shall deem necessary or desirable to carry on the work of such corporation or corporations: Provided, That nothing in this chapter shall prevent such corporation or corporations from employing civilians in the manner customary in the conduct of ordinary business under corporate organization.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of War, acting through the Director of Aircraft Production, is authorized to transfer, by appropriate instruments, to any such corporation as may be found under this chapter, any interest of the United States in any existing contracts for aircraft, aircraft equipment, or materials therefor, and the title to any lands, plants, railroads, or equipment used in or in connection with the production of aircraft, aircraft equipment, or materials therefor, on such terms as the Secretary of War, acting through the Director of Aircraft Production, shall deem fit.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think that had better go over. In all human probability we can not finish the bill to-night. A number of Senators have amendments which they desire to propose and probably will discuss. Some Senators have suggested that Chapter XVI should go over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The next amendment was, on page 119, line 20, to insert as a subhead "Chapter XVII," and line 21, to insert as a side heading "Power of the President to increase the drafted Army," so as to make the clause read:

CHAPTER XVII.

Power of the President to increase the drafted Army: That the authority conferred upon the President by the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," is hereby extended so as to authorize him during each fiscal year to raise by draft as provided in said act and acts amendatory thereof the maximum number of men which may be organized, equipped, trained, and used during such year for the prosecution of the present war until the same shall have been brought to a successful conclusion.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 120, line 7, to insert as a subhead "Chapter XVIII"; line 8, before the word "That," to strike out "Provided" and insert as a side heading "Time-measuring devices"; in line 9, after the word "this," to strike out "act" and insert "chapter"; and in line 17, after the word "work," to strike out "; nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premiums or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant," so as to make the clause read:

CHAPTER XVIII.

Time-measuring devices: That no part of the appropriations in this chapter shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made with a stop watch, or other time-measuring device, a time study of any such employee between the starting and completing thereof, or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 120, after line 21, to insert:

That any act inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That completes the amendments of the committee, except those that have been carried over.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. As I stated a while ago, some Senators desire to offer amendments to the bill, and they are engaged in committee work. In view of that fact, I suggest that the bill go over until to-morrow when the Senate convenes.

Mr. KING. I desire to offer an amendment that it may be printed and lie on the table. It will consist of another chapter, Chapter XIX. I will say to the Senator from Oregon that it is the same bill which passed this body on Thursday last, giving the Secretary of War and certain corporations that are employed in furnishing power to the Government authority to exercise the right of eminent domain in certain States where that power is denied. The bill passed the Senate without objection and is now in the House. It may not be reported there for some time, and I am sure that it is very important. I am told by Mr. Buckley, who represented the War Industries Board, that so far as he is advised there will be no objection on the part of the House Military Committee to this measure.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does the Senator propose it as an amendment to Chapter XVI?

Mr. KING. No; perhaps it ought to be an independent chapter.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to it, Mr. President. We can in conference, if need be, take up each one of the bills and undertake to reconcile them if there are any differences between them. So I am perfectly willing, as far as I am concerned, to accept the amendment and let it go on the bill.

Mr. KING. Then, I move that as an amendment.

Mr. FALL. Without objection, I should like to offer an amendment which I shall propose and let it be printed. I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Utah proposes to add, as an additional section, the following:

SEC. —. That during the pendency of the present war any person, association, or corporation, for the purpose of furnishing electric power to the United States or to persons, associations, or corporations engaged in the manufacture of ships, explosives, or munitions of war, or other articles and things for the use of the United States or its allies, upon compliance with the conditions hereinafter set forth, may institute proceedings in any district court of the United States or in any court of any State having jurisdiction of the property to be condemned, for the acquirement by condemnation of any land, the temporary use thereof, or other interest therein, or right pertaining thereto, required for the location or construction of any power plant, or for the transmission of electric power for the operation of any plants which are or may be employed in the production of the articles and things hereinbefore mentioned: Provided, That the right acquired by the condemnation herein authorized shall terminate when the power furnished ceases to be used in production for the United States or for the allies of this country in the present war. That proceedings for the condemnation of property required for the generation and transmission of such electric power shall be prosecuted in accordance with the procedure prescribed for the condemnation of property in the State wherein the proceedings may be instituted.

That before any person, association, or corporation, furnishing or to furnish electric power for the purposes mentioned in section 1 of this act, shall have the right to institute proceedings for condemnation, they shall submit to the Secretary of War a full and complete statement of the plan for furnishing power and the nature and extent of the easements or property which they desire to acquire under condemnation proceedings, for the purposes stated in the preceding section. If the Secretary of War approve such plan and finds that the construction or extension of such facilities for the generation or transmission of power and that the condemnation herein authorized is necessary to increase the supply of power for the objects and purposes stated in section 1 of this act, then such person, association, or corporation shall, upon the approval of such plan by the Secretary of War, have the right to construct, maintain, and operate the facilities described in such plan, and may cause proceedings to be instituted in any court having jurisdiction thereof for the acquirement by condemnation of any lands, the temporary use thereof, or other interest therein, or right pertaining thereto, as may be needed for the construction, maintenance, and operation of such facilities: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed as authorizing any rights in any public lands of the United States, or in any waters of the United States except such as may be necessary to build such transmission lines along or across said waters as may be approved by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That the Secretary of War may, prior to granting his approval as above set forth, require such person, association, or corporation to file with him a bond, in an amount and with a surety or sureties satisfactory to him, conditioned upon the prompt construction of the proposed facilities and the diligent maintenance and operation of the same to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War during the present war.

That any person, association, or corporation having secured the approval of the Secretary of War and filed a petition for condemnation as herein provided may, upon filing with the court in which such petition is filed a bond to secure payment of just compensation to the owners of property taken, in a form and an amount and with a surety or sureties approved by said court after such notice and such hearing as the court may prescribe, have the right of immediate possession and use of such property or rights.

That no plan for the construction or extension of any facilities shall be submitted to or approved by the Secretary of War hereunder after the existing state of war between the United States and its enemies shall have terminated and the fact of such termination shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President, but such termination of the existing state of war so ascertained and proclaimed shall not interfere with the condemnation of any land or other property or rights needed for the construction, maintenance, and operation of any facilities approved hereunder by the Secretary of War before such proclamation: Provided, however, That the Secretary of War may upon such termination of the existing state of war and prior to the entry of judgment in any condemnation proceeding hereunder and the commencement of construction or extension of the proposed facilities revoke any approval given hereunder to the plan for such proposed facilities: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed as granting the right to operate such facilities after the termination of the existing state of war.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am compelled to make a point of order against the amendment. I think it is properly a matter for the Judiciary Committee of the two Houses to pass upon rather than the Military Committee. That is the only reason why I make the point of order.

Mr. KING. If the point of order is made I will submit it to the consideration of the President of the Senate. I sincerely hope the Senator from Wisconsin will not make the point of order. I am advised by the War Industries Board that this bill is very important, and the lack of the legislation is hampering certain activities now that are very essential in the prosecution of the war.

Mr. LENROOT. I appreciate the importance of the bill, but on the other hand, if it were not for the amendments that were adopted by the Senate, it would be a bill of far-reaching importance extending beyond the period of the war. Because of the possibility that those amendments might not be agreed to by the House, I do not think it ought to go as a rider on an appropriation bill. It involves solely the right of eminent domain for private persons.

Mr. KING. The Senator will perceive that in the pending bill as reported by the committee there is a provision for the requisitioning of certain timber and timberlands and mill properties that are deemed necessary, notwithstanding the fact that that bill has already passed the House and is now before the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. LENROOT. That is a requisition on the part of the Government for Government use, while the amendment now pending is one that relates to private persons and private corporations.

Mr. KING. I will say to the Senator if the Judiciary Committee of the House shall feel that it ought to be considered by them I am perfectly willing that the conferees shall strike the provision from the bill. I can assure the Senator that the Judiciary Committee will be conferred with. Indeed, I understand that some of the members have already been seen. If objection is made to this measure being incorporated in the pending bill I am perfectly willing that the conferees shall strike out the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not know, of course, what the action of the committee of the House may be. It is a matter that is proper for the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. I will say to the Senator if he could give like assurance that the provision limiting it to the period of the war shall remain in the bill I would not object.

Mr. KING. As far as I can give any assurance the bill shall be in its present form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin withdraw his point of order?

Mr. LENROOT. I appreciate the fact that the Senator from Utah, of course, will not be a member of the conference and he is unable to give any assurance of that kind. I shall therefore insist on the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has offered an amendment.

Mr. FALL. I ask that it be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 120, after line 6, insert:

Provided, That the age limit fixed under said act is hereby changed and shall be, and is hereby, fixed at 18 and 45 years in lieu of 21 and 31: Provided further, That those registered under the age of 21 shall not be drafted nor used for service upon the firing line until they have reached the age of 21.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent to return to page 90 with reference to the purchase of real estate for military purposes. That was passed over, and I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment of the committee. After the figures "$316,941," in line 20, I move to insert "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not understand that the Senate has acted on the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from New Mexico to present an amendment and ask that it be read.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That was all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand that the Senator from New Mexico is now pressing his amendment?

Mr. FALL. Under the statement of the chairman that he would ask that the bill go over, I simply desire to have the amendment printed, and I shall offer it at the proper time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There will be other amendments along the same line, I think, and all can be discussed together.

Mr. FALL. I have a few other amendments to the bill which have been printed heretofore, and I shall offer them at the proper time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask if chapter IX, with reference to Army mine-planter service, has been adopted?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It was.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that that may go over. I shall probably want to submit an amendment to it, and I have not the data here. If it is agreeable to the Senator, I should like to have it reconsidered and go over until to-morrow.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to that. It will have to be reconsidered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let that be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is reconsidered, and it goes over.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask the Senator from Oregon if he would object to a brief executive session?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly not. I was going to ask that the bill might go over and have the consideration of it resumed at 12 o'clock to-morrow as the unfinished business.

Mr. FRANCE. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield that I may offer an amendment to the bill to be printed?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say that we have an important matter to come up in executive session; but I am willing to yield to any momentary matter.

Mr. FRANCE. I desire to offer an amendment that it may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

MINIMUM WAGE BOARD.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that at the conclusion of the Army appropriation bill I shall call up for consideration the bill (S. 4548) to protect the lives and health and morals of women and minor workmen in the District of Columbia, and to establish a minimum wage board, and define its powers and duties, and to provide for the fixing of minimum wages for such workers, and for other purposes. I know this does not give me any right, but I do it so that the friends and opponents of the bill may be on notice.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 18 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RATIFICATION OF TREATIES.

The following treaties were ratified this day in executive session and the injunction of secrecy was removed therefrom:

EXTENSION OF ARBITRATION WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith, to receive the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, an agreement between the United States and Great Britain, concluded June 3, 1918, extending and continuing for a further period of five years from June 4, 1918, the arbitration convention of April 4, 1908, between the two Governments.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
June —, 1918.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate if his judgment approve thereof, to receive the advice and consent of that body to its ratification, an agreement between the United States and Great Britain, extending and continuing for a further period of five years from June 4, 1918, the arbitration convention concluded between the two Governments on April 4, 1908.

Respectfully submitted.

ROBERT LANSING.

Inclosure: Agreement extending the arbitration convention of April 4, 1908, between the United States and Great Britain.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 4, 1918.

AGREEMENT EXTENDING FOR ANOTHER PERIOD OF FIVE YEARS THE ARBITRATION CONVENTION OF APRIL 4, 1908, BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN.

The President of the United States of America and his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, being desirous of extending for another five years the period during which the Arbitration Convention concluded between them on April 4, 1908, extended by the agreement concluded between the two Governments on May 31, 1913, shall remain in force, have authorized the undersigned, to wit: Robert Lansing, Secretary of State of the United States, and the Earl of Reading, His Britannic Majesty's Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary on Special Mission to the United States, to conclude the following article:

ARTICLE I.

The Convention of Arbitration of April 4, 1908, between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, the duration of which by Article IV thereof was fixed at a period of five years from the date of the exchange of ratifications of the said convention on June 4, 1908, which period by the agreement of May 31, 1913, between the two Governments was extended for five years from June 4, 1913, is hereby extended and continued in force for the further period of five years from June 4, 1918.

ARTICLE II.

The present agreement shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty, and it shall become effective upon the date of the exchange of ratifications which shall take place at Washington as soon as possible.

Done in duplicate this 3d day of June, 1918.

MILITARY SERVICE OF BRITISH SUBJECTS IN THE UNITED STATES AND OF CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES IN GREAT BRITAIN AND CANADA.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 4, 1918.

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith to receive the advice and consent of the Senate to their ratification two conventions between the United States and Great Britain, signed on the 3d day of June, 1918, in respect to military service of British subjects in the United States and citizens of the United States in Great Britain and Canada.

The attention of the Senate is invited to the accompanying report of the Secretary of State, in which I fully concur.

WOODROW WILSON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 4, 1918.

THE PRESIDENT:

On March 20 you requested the Senate to return to you for reconsideration the two conventions between the United States and Great Britain, signed on the 19th day of February, 1918, in respect to military service of British subjects in the United States and citizens of the United States in Great Britain and Canada, which conventions had been transmitted by you to the Senate on February 20 to receive the advice and consent of the Senate to their ratification. On March 21 the Senate returned to you these conventions, and since that date negotiations with the British Government have been pressed with a view to making certain changes in their phraseology. These negotiations having been concluded, the undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to resubmit to you the amended conventions with a view to their transmission to the Senate, unless you perceive objection thereto, for the advice and consent of that body to their ratification. I also inclose an exchange of notes relative to article 1 of the convention relating to citizens of the United States in Great Britain, which notes are self-explanatory.

In the renewed negotiations it was sought to modify the earlier conventions, if possible, by having inserted the American age limits for compulsory military service in Great Britain; by making the conventions inapplicable to subjects of Great Britain who were not liable to compulsory military service at home; by amending or omitting the article in respect to the determination of questions of "dual nationality"; and by modifying the clause providing for the termination of the convention. On all these points the negotiations have proceeded satisfactorily, except as to the first, in respect to which it has again been necessary to make an exchange of notes setting forth the reasons for the omission in the British convention of the age limits within which American citizens in Great Britain would be subject to compulsory military service. The conventions have also been modified in order to make them applicable to subjects of Great Britain in the United States from parts of the British dominions which have adopted or may hereafter adopt compulsory military service, and also to citizens of the United States in Great Britain or Canada within the age limits which might hereafter be adopted for compulsory military service in the United States.

A few minor verbal changes which it is not necessary to mention specifically have also been made in the interest of precision and clearness of expression.

Respectfully submitted.

ROBERT LANSING.

NOTES RELATING TO ARTICLE I.

BRITISH EMBASSY,
Washington, June 3, 1918.

HON. ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State of the United States.

SIR: With reference to the military-service convention between the United States and Great Britain signed to-day, I am instructed by His Majesty's Government to explain why the proviso to Article I does not limit the military service of citizens of the United States in Great Britain to those of the ages specified in the laws of the United States prescribing compulsory military service, as requested by the United States Government. The reason for the omission of this clause in the proviso is a desire to avoid the delay that would be involved in modifying the military service acts, 1916 to 1918, which control the operation of any convention of this character. I beg you, therefore, to be good enough not to press this proposal.

The effect of these acts is to make United States citizens in Great Britain under this convention liable to military service between the ages of 18 and 49, both inclusive. The limitation of the ages of United States citizens in Great Britain for the purpose of military service to those prescribed in the laws of the United States relating to compulsory military service may, however, be attained without amendment of these acts by exercise of the United States of its right of exemption under Article III.

His Majesty's Government understand, therefore, that the United States Government will exercise their right under Article III to exempt from compulsory military service in Great Britain all citizens of the United States in Great Britain outside the ages specified in the laws of the United States prescribing compulsory military service.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir,
Your most obedient, humble servant,

READING.

JUNE 3, 1918.

His Excellency the EARL OF READING,
Ambassador of Great Britain on Special Mission:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Your Excellency's note of this date in regard to the military service convention between the United States and Great Britain, signed to-day, in which you state that you are instructed to explain why the proviso to Article I does not limit the military service of citizens of the United States in Great Britain to those of the ages specified in the laws of the United States prescribing compulsory military service as requested by the United States Government. In explanation Your Excellency states as follows:

The reason for the omission of this clause in the proviso is a desire to avoid the delay which would be involved in modifying the military service acts, 1916 to 1918, which control the operation of any convention of this character. I beg you, therefore, to be good enough not to press this proposal.

The effect of these acts is to make United States citizens in Great Britain under this convention liable to military service between the ages of 18 and 49 years, both inclusive. The limitation of the ages of United States citizens in Great Britain for the purposes of military service to those prescribed in the laws of the United States relating to compulsory military service may, however, be attained without amendment of these acts by the exercise by the United States of its right of exemption under Article III.

Your excellency adds that—

His Majesty's Government understand, therefore, that the United States Government will exercise its right under Article III to exempt from compulsory military service in Great Britain all citizens of the United States in Great Britain outside the ages specified in the laws of the United States prescribing compulsory military service.

In reply I have the honor to inform your excellency that the Government of the United States is pleased to accept this explanation of said Article I, and, in lieu of a clause in this article limiting the military service of citizens of the United States in Great Britain to those of the ages specified in the laws of the United States prescribing compulsory military service, to exercise its right under Article III to exempt from compulsory military service in Great Britain all citizens of the United States in Great Britain outside of the ages specified in the laws of the United States prescribing compulsory military service.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration,
Your excellency's most obedient servant,

ROBERT LANSING.

PART I.

CONVENTION RELATING TO THE SERVICE OF CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES IN GREAT BRITAIN AND OF BRITISH SUBJECTS IN THE UNITED STATES.

The President of the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, being convinced that for the better prosecution of the present war it is desirable that citizens of the United States in Great Britain and British subjects in the United States shall either return to their own country to perform military service in its Army or shall serve in the Army of the country in which they remain, have resolved to enter into a convention to that end, and have accordingly appointed as their plenipotentiaries, the President of the United States of America, Robert Lansing, Secretary of State of the United States, and His Brittannic Majesty, the Earl of Reading, Lord Chief Justice of England, High Commissioner and Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary on Special Mission to the United States, who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found to be in proper form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

All male citizens of the United States in Great Britain and all male British subjects in the United States shall, unless before the time limited by this convention they enlist or enroll in the forces of their own country or return to the United States or Great Britain, respectively, for the purpose of military service, be subject to military service and entitled to exemption or discharge therefrom under the laws and regulations from time to time in force of the country in which they are: Provided, That in respect to British subjects in the United States the ages for military service shall be for the time being 20 to 44 years, both inclusive: Provided, however, That no citizen of the United States in Great Britain and no British subject in the United States who, before proceeding to Great Britain or the United States, respectively, was ordinarily resident in a place in the possessions of the United States or in His Majesty's dominions, respectively, where the law does not impose a compulsory military service shall, by virtue of this convention, be liable to military service under the laws and regulations of Great Britain or the United States, respectively: Provided, further, That in the event of compulsory military service being applied to any part of His Majesty's dominions in which military service at present is not compulsory, British subjects who before proceeding to the United States were ordinarily resident in such part of His Majesty's dominions shall thereupon be included within the terms of this convention.

ARTICLE II.

Citizens of the United States and British subjects within the age limits aforesaid who desire to enter the military service of their own country must, after making such application therefor as may be prescribed by the laws or regulations of the country in which they are, enlist or enroll or must leave Great Britain or the United States, as the case may be, for the purpose of military service in their own country before the expiration of 60 days after the date of the exchange of ratifications of this convention, if liable to military service in the country in which they are at the said date; or if not so liable, then before the expiration of 30 days after the time when liability shall accrue; or as to those holding certificates of exemption under Article III of this convention, before the expiration of 30 days after the date on which any such certificate becomes inoperative unless sooner renewed; or as to those who apply for certificates of exemption under Article III and whose applications are refused, then before the expiration of 30 days after the date of such refusal, unless the application be sooner granted.

ARTICLE III.

The Government of the United States and His Britannic Majesty's Government may through their respective diplomatic representatives issue certificates of exemption from military service to citizens of the United States in Great Britain and British subjects in the United States, respectively, upon application or otherwise, within 60 days from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this convention, or within 30 days from the date when such citizens or subjects become liable to military service in accordance with Article I, provided that the applications be made or the certificates be granted prior to their entry into the military service of either country.

Such certificates may be special or general, temporary or conditional, and may be modified, renewed, or revoked in the discretion of the Government granting them. Persons holding such certificates shall, so long as the certificates are in force, not be liable to military service in the country in which they are.

ARTICLE IV.

This convention shall not apply to British subjects in the United States (a) who were born or naturalized in Canada, and who, before proceeding to the United States, were ordinarily resident in Great Britain or Canada or in any other part of His Majesty's Dominions to which compulsory military service has been or may be hereafter by law applied, or outside the British Dominions; or (b) who were not born or naturalized in Canada, but who before proceeding to the United States were ordinarily resident in Canada.

ARTICLE V.

The Government of the United States and His Britannic Majesty's Government will, respectively, so far as possible facilitate the return of British subjects and citizens of the United States who may desire to return to their own country for military service, but shall not be responsible for providing transport or the cost of transport for such persons.

ARTICLE VI.

No citizen or subject of either country who, under the provisions of this convention, enters the military service of the other shall, by reason of such service, be considered after this convention shall have expired or after his discharge to have lost his nationality or to be under any allegiance to His Britannic Majesty or to the United States, as the case may be.

ARTICLE VII.

The present convention shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and by His Britannic Majesty, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London as soon as possible. It shall come into operation on the date on which the ratifications are exchanged and shall remain in force until the expiration of 60 days after either of the contracting parties shall have given notice of termination to the other; whereupon any subject or citizen of either country incorporated into the military service of the other under this convention shall be as soon as possible discharged therefrom.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention and have affixed thereto their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington the 3d day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and eighteen.

CONVENTION RELATING TO THE SERVICE OF CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES IN CANADA AND OF CANADIANS IN THE UNITED STATES.

The President of the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions Beyond the Seas, Emperor of India being convinced that for the better prosecution of the present war it is desirable that citizens of the United States in Canada and Canadian British subjects in the United States shall either return to their own country to perform military service in its army or shall serve in the army of the country in which they remain, have resolved to enter into a convention to that end and have accordingly appointed as their plenipotentiaries the President of the United States of America, Robert Lansing, Secretary of State of the United States, and His Britannic Majesty, the Earl of Reading, Lord Chief Justice of England, high commissioner and ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary on special mission to the United States, who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers found to be in proper form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

All male citizens of the United States in Canada (hereinafter called Americans) and all male British subjects in the United States (a) who were born or naturalized in Canada, and who, before proceeding to the United States were ordinarily resident in Great Britain or Canada or in any other part of His Majesty's Dominions to which compulsory military service has been or may be hereafter by law applied, or outside the British Dominions; or (b) who were not born or naturalized in Canada, but who, before proceeding to the United States, were ordinarily resident in Canada (hereinafter called Canadians) shall, unless before the time limited by this convention they enlist or enroll in the forces of their own country or return to the United States or Canada, respectively, for the purpose of military service, be subject to military service and entitled to exemption or discharge therefrom under the laws and regulations, from time to time in force, of the country in which they are: Provided, That in respect to Americans in Canada, the ages for military service shall be the ages specified in the laws of the United States prescribing compulsory military service, and in respect to Canadians in the United States the ages for military service shall be for the time being 20 to 44 years, both inclusive.

ARTICLE II.

Americans and Canadians within the age limits aforesaid who desire to enter the military service of their own country must enlist or enroll or must leave Canada or the United States, as the case may be, for the purpose of military service in their own country before the expiration of 60 days after the date of the exchange of ratifications of this convention, if liable to military service in the country in which they are at the said date; or, if not liable, then before the expiration of 30 days after the time when liability shall accrue; or, as to those holding certificates of exemption under Article III of this convention, before the expiration of 30 days after the date on which any such certificate becomes inoperative unless sooner renewed; or as to those who apply for certificates of exemption under Article III, and whose applications are refused, then before the expiration of 30 days after the date of such refusal unless the application be sooner granted.

ARTICLE III.

The Government of the United States, through the consul general at Ottawa, and His Britannic Majesty's Government through the British ambassador at Washington, may issue certificates of exemption from military service to Americans and Canadians, respectively, upon application or otherwise, within 60 days from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this convention or within 30 days from the date when such citizens or subjects become liable to military service in accordance with Article I, provided that the applications be made or the certificates be granted prior to their entry into the military service of either country. Such certificates may be special or general, temporary or conditional, and may be modified, renewed, or revoked in the discretion of the Government granting them. Persons holding such certificates shall, so long as the certificates are in force, not be liable to military service in the country in which they are.

ARTICLE IV.

The Government of the United States and the Government of Canada will, respectively, so far as possible facilitate the return of Canadians and Americans who may desire to return to their own country for military service, but shall not be responsible for providing transport or the cost of transport for such persons.

ARTICLE V.

No citizen or subject of either country who, under the provisions of this convention, enters the military service of the other shall, by reason of such service, be considered, after this convention shall have expired or after his discharge, to have lost his nationality or to be under any allegiance to the United States or to His Britannic Majesty, as the case may be.

ARTICLE VI.

The present convention shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and by His Britannic Majesty, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London as soon as possible. It shall come into operation on the date on which the ratifications are exchanged and shall remain in force until the expiration of 60 days after either of the contracting parties shall have given notice of termination to the other; whereupon any citizen or subject of either country incorporated into the military service of the other under this convention shall be as soon as possible discharged therefrom.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention and have affixed thereto their seals.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 24, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God Almighty, our life, our light, our strength, our courage, our faith, our hope, our inspiration to every pure thought and worthy endeavor, we thank Thee for the prosperity and phenomenal growth of our Republic, which presents to the world an object lesson in a government of the people; for the conspicuous and important position it has been forced to assume in the affairs of the world.

Be with those who are called upon to administer the affairs of State and guide them in this hour of peril; especially be with our soldiers, sailors, and aviators who are battling for the right, that they with our allies may beat back the foes of liberty and justice; that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done. In Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, the bill H. R. 11984, providing for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, is the unfinished business. It is a privileged bill. I believe if I was disposed to press it that I could insist on proceeding with it, but I recognize the fact that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations, has a bill looking to the purchase of the necessary equipment for the armament of our forces, and I think it is in good taste and good business that the appropriation bills should be cleared, if possible, before the beginning of the next fiscal year. I will therefore not insist at this time upon proceeding with the bill providing for the Fourteenth Census, but I hope at the conclusion of the appropriation bill there will be no further obstruction to the consideration of the census bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Kentucky, and I join with him in the hope that when this necessary appropriation bill is passed and goes to the Senate the House will immediately resume the consideration of the census bill, which is a privileged bill under the Constitution, and I think is entitled to the right of way.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the census bill have the right of way as soon as the fortifications bill is out of the way?

The SPEAKER. That will be owing to circumstances; there is another appropriation bill yet to be passed. The Chair has no sort of doubt, however, that the gentleman from Kentucky will get his day as soon as this bill is through.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Commitee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 7634. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 10477. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 11364. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 11663. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 10850. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 8496. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 9160. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 9612. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. H. 10027. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

PENSIONS.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I present the conference reports on the bills H. R. 9506, 9641, 10843, 10924, and 11658 to be printed under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the titles.

The Clerk read the titles of the reports.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills and joint resolutions:

H. R. 11185. An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes;

H. R. 10297. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their locomotives with safe and suitable boilers and appurtenances thereto," approved February 17, 1911;

H. R. 8563. An act to amend the homestead law in its application to Alaska, and for other purposes;

H. R. 11663. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 7634. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 8496. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 10477. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 10850. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 11364. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 9160. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 10027. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 9612. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. J. Res. 70. Joint resolution authorizing the erection on the public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a statue of James Buchanan, a former President of the United States; and

H. J. Res. 255. Joint resolution authorizing the readmission to the United States of certain aliens who have been conscripted or who have volunteered for service with the military forces of the United States or cobelligerent forces.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12341) making appropriations for fortifications, with other works of defense, and pending that motion I will ask the gentleman from Iowa what agreement we can arrive at as to the time for general debate.

Mr. GOOD. I have some requests on this side for time, and I suppose we can get along with two hours on this side.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I was about to propose that we have an hour and a half on a side, if that will suit the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GOOD. I am not inclined to object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the fortification appropriation bill, and pending that motion, he asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be confined to three hours, to be controlled one half by the gentleman from Missouri and the other half by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] and that debate be confined to the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I did not understand the gentleman from Iowa to make that request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa did not make a request; the gentleman from Missouri made the request.

Mr. STAFFORD. But I am calling attention to the fact that the gentleman from Iowa does not agree to have general debate confined to the bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to insert that in my request.

The SPEAKER. Then we will leave that out. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion of Mr. BORLAND was then agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. ALEXANDER in the chair.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I desire to present to the House the bill making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense for the fiscal year 1919. This bill carries a total of $5,435,000,000, of which $2,800,000,000 is in cash and $2,600,000,000 is in contract authorizations. The report discloses that this bill is based upon estimates totaling $9,018,000,000, but it is proper to say to the House that at no time was there $9,018,000,000 requested of the committee by the department. The committee examined estimates which totaled that amount, but many of the estimates were withdrawn in the course of the hearings. Others were duplicate and overlapping estimates. Others were alternative estimates which were drawn first in one form and then upon further consideration and fuller advice were drawn in a different form, but both estimates being technically before the committee.

This bill represents a substantial agreement between the committee and the War Department as to all of its major items. The House will observe that it is like no other fortification bill that has ever been presented to the American Congress. In fact, it should not be called a fortification bill; it should more properly be designated a bill to provide scientific armament for a modern army. It is necessary for the House to understand the theory upon which the committee drew this bill. We drew it upon the theory that we have in France to-day and will have during the life of this bill an army devoted to the protection of the cause of liberty and democracy in the world; and that the chief, the paramount, question before the people is not the matter of coast defense but is the problem of supplying and equipping a vast army upon the plains of France. We are just arousing the giant energies of the American Nation to arm and equip that Army, to meet and to conquer the most scientific foe that the world has ever seen. We drew the bill upon the theory that the resources of this country are ample to accomplish that great task. We drew it upon the theory that we must, in order to win this struggle, strip for the race, and we must lay aside all unnecessary work, all work that can be deferred, all avoidable burdens and demands upon our industrial systems, all unnecessary demands upon labor, upon material, upon transportation, upon production, in order that we may centralize this year upon the great duty of equipping and arming that force in the field. It was upon that theory that the bill is drawn. Gentlemen will observe that it lays its greatest emphasis upon the question of mountain, field, and siege artillery for that Army, and for the ammunition for the supply of those guns. The appropriation for guns and artillery for the Army is $500,000,000 cash and $729,000,000 in contract authorizations. The appropriation for ammunition is $2,000,000,000 in cash and $1,300,000,000 in contract authorizations.

These items constitute the major items of the bill. We have subordinated to that program all matters of purely domestic concern. A few estimates were submitted for the construction or completion of the coast fortifications, which generally constitute the major items of the bill. During the course of the hearings all estimates for projected construction on seacoast fortifications were withdrawn by the department. Those that are under construction, those that can be completed during the present fiscal year, are preserved and provided for, but no new construction is authorized at any point which would cause an additional demand upon the material, the labor, and the transportation of the country, which would interfere with the program of gun construction. In addition, the department voluntarily surrendered back a total of more than $15,000,000 that has heretofore been appropriated for purely construction work, work which can not be done under the existing circumstances, and which ought not to be done. Such appropriations are continuous by these terms. They were good until used, and if they were not used they remained in the Treasury. Yet it appeared to the committee and the department that fairness to the House and the country demanded that at this crisis the people should know exactly, to the dollar, how much the tax burden is that they must meet this year, and if any money were already technically appropriated in the Treasury of the United States which the administration had no intention or desire to use it should be voluntarily relinquished back to the Congress in order that Congress may be in a position to know the exact demands upon the Federal Treasury in consideration of the necessary revenue bill. The great item, therefore, in the bill is the program of Field Artillery.

That Field Artillery program, I may say to the House, contemplates the arming and equipping of three armies, each army consisting of 1,375,000 men, an aggregate of 4,125,000 men, of which at least 3,000,000 should be combatant. Not to exceed 375,000 out of each army are the necessary noncombatant forces to keep up the lines of communication. Each army is divided into 5 corps, and each corps into 6 divisions, making 30 divisions to the army. Of the six divisions of the corps four are combatant divisions, one replacement, and one training division. The committee had before it a careful estimate, framed by Gen. Pershing after the most accurate observation on the needs of the Army in France and the experience of the allies, approved by the Allied Council in Paris, approved by the General Staff and the War Department in this country, embracing a program of Field Artillery for the equipment of each division, each corps, and each army. That information, on account of its military character, is not printed in the hearings, though I might say at this point that it is open to any Member of the House upon his official responsibility. That the program of Field Artillery, so far as I am able to learn, is more complete, more varied, stronger in every line, than any program of Field Artillery with which any existing army has ever been equipped, not excepting the German Army itself. It exceeds largely the initial equipment of any of the armies of our allies.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. For a question, if it is pertinent at this point.

Mr. HICKS. It is in regard to artillery, and if it is not proper for the gentleman to answer it I hope he will feel free to say so. I notice in the appropriation for mountain, field, and siege cannon the appropriation and contract is $1,324,000,000. What percentage of this is allowed for wastage? I understand there must be some basis for figuring a thing of that kind.

Mr. BORLAND. There is.

Mr. HICKS. Is it proper to state it?

Mr. BORLAND. Unfortunately not. This program embraces an initial equipment of each division, corps, and army. It then embraces a percentage on top of that for training purposes, and then a percentage on top of the combined amount for wastage, replacement, repairs in the field, including even capture, losses, and destruction. Those percentages are higher than the percentage of the British, which is higher than the percentage of the French. I am not able at this time to give the gentleman the exact figure, but will give it to him at a future time.

Mr. HICKS. Now, another question on the same line. This estimate of ammunition would also include the same percentage as to the wastage of guns?

Mr. BORLAND. The same principle applies to ammunition that applies to guns, but not to the same extent, because the ammunition is wasted. The principle of ammunition is consumption, and while we overestimate the necessary supply of ammunition in order to have a sufficient supply going forward, it is not upon exactly the same theory as we overestimate the supply of guns. On ammunition I can give a very clear conception. We have estimated that we will open a channel embracing 90 days from the factory to the firing line, and we are going to fill that channel with ammunition hereafter; we are going to feed ammunition into this end and let it come out at the other end, and have a 90 days' supply in transit. That will be clear to the gentleman, I know.

Mr. HICKS. The other question is in regard to the $3,000,000 for aviation purposes. That, of course, is entirely separate and distinct from the appropriation already made——

Mr. BORLAND. Where is the gentleman referring to the $3,000,000 for aviation?

Mr. HICKS. Page 8 of the report.

Mr. BORLAND. That is the appropriation of 1918.

Mr. HICKS. I meant to say $18,500,000. That is entirely separate and distinct, of course, from other appropriations we have passed for the Aircraft Board.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. I will answer that more fully hereafter.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry, under the limitations, of course, already observed? I was very much interested in the gentleman's statement about the completeness of the size of the program. Of course with the $3,000,000,000, and a program of $6,000,000,000 for the next year, making a total of $9,000,000,000, as far as the amount appropriated may be concerned, it is unprecedented in the history even of this great war, and fills all with great satisfaction, provided the money will be spent to get results. My inquiry of the gentleman therefore is if he can state how much has been produced in artillery out of the appropriation of $3,000,000,000 made for the year now closing. Can the gentleman give the committee any information as to how much artillery has been actually produced out of the appropriation made last year?

Mr. BORLAND. I could give the gentleman exact figures up until the 15th of June if it were deemed proper. I may say this only: An appropriation was made under the act of June 15, 1917, and another under the act of October 6, 1917, and some contract authorizations and some cash under the act of March 28, 1918. Under those appropriations it was attempted to provide for not exceeding one and a half million men. The pending appropriations are based upon a three-army program, which I have heretofore explained. It enlarged the former program with certain additional features that were not included therein. This program not only includes an additional army of a million and a half men but includes some additional features of the prior program. Under the prior program a large number of batteries were estimated for as horse drawn. It now appears it is not desirable nor safe to attempt to maintain horses in France and to provide forage for them. We are abolishing horse-drawn batteries, and this bill provides for the motorization of batteries previously authorized as horse drawn, which increases to some extent the estimates. I should like to give the gentleman deliveries, but I will assure him those——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If the gentleman can give information on that subject I am sure it will be interesting.

Mr. BORLAND. I would not be justified in giving deliveries, but I want to say this at this particular point. I have explained to the House we are providing for three armies, and that we must stimulate production and increase our facilities in this country in order to meet that great program. It is not unknown to most of the Members of this House that we are providing ourselves from French sources with artillery and ammunition for the 30 divisions of the American Army.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. May I make this inquiry at this point? My understanding is that we have actually produced in this country nothing for delivery yet, and all we have has been purchased?

Mr. BORLAND. I can assure the gentleman that is a mistaken impression.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is what I wanted corrected when I made the inquiry.

Mr. BORLAND. I am glad the gentleman made that inquiry. We have produced and are now producing. Deliveries have begun in quantity, not sample guns but stock deliveries have begun.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is the quantity sufficient to be material?

Mr. BORLAND. I think so, and I was just about to explain that point.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. One further inquiry. The gentleman has stated that most of the Artillery equipment has been purchased up until now. Can the gentleman tell me what we have been paying the French for their "seventy-fives"?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I could tell.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Well, that certainly is not a military secret. If the gentleman has it, I wish he would give it to the House.

Mr. BORLAND. No; I would not feel justified in doing that for several reasons. Gen. Pershing is making contracts in France for a supply of 30 divisions, which contracts involve the delivery to the French of 75 per cent payment of them in certain raw materials. The price we are paying in France on the face of it is, I believe, actually less than the price we are paying in this country.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. May I make this inquiry? Will the gentleman state whether the price we are paying is greater or less than the cost of manufacture in the United States of the same articles?

Mr. BORLAND. The price in France is less than the cost of manufacturing in the United States.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is the gentleman advised of that? Is he very positive about that?

Mr. BORLAND. That is my clear-cut impression, and it is quite clear; and we gain a further advantage I think in the supply of raw materials, so far as the purchase price is concerned.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I have one other question, and I may as well ask it now, as the gentleman is so good as to answer. How many plants has the War Department constructed or how many is it constructing for the exclusive manufacture of artillery?

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman will find in the back of the hearings a tabulated list of the plants to which I was going to refer a little later on.

Now, I want to say a word about this supplying of the 30 divisions in France, because this is a matter I think the House will be glad to hear and ought to understand. So much has been said about our buying material in France that I think we ought to have a clear idea of what is actually being done. Gen. Pershing has entered into contracts for the supply of 30 divisions of the American Army with artillery and ammunition in France. That is what we call the initial equipment. It does not embrace the percentage for wastage, repairs, and replacement. All those deliveries are contemplated to be made between now and the 1st of January, 1919. As I say, a part of the purchase price is paid in raw material from this country, which the French need, and which is a valuable arrangement both to us and to France. The French have been able to comply with their part of the contract. They have had no difficulty in complying with it, in the first place, and, in the second place, our troops have been brigaded with the British and the French for the past few weeks, so that they have been using the French artillery and ammunition and not using ours. As a result the deliveries that have been due us have been accumulating in France and our credit has been growing. There is a gain of material for our troops in France which we have not had occasion to need.

I want to say one very serious thing, that I know will not be misunderstood at this point: It is possible, and the last few weeks have shown it, that some catastrophe might happen that would greatly embarrass France in the completion of those contracts. While the committee was in the course of its hearings that danger was more imminent then, I am thankful to say, than it is at the present moment. If the blow had fallen, as we feared sometimes it might fall, and leave one of our allies struggling for its bare existence, we know that a very different situation would have been presented. Fortunately, we do not believe any such thing will happen, but while it has not happened and will not happen it is the part of wisdom, of course, to prepare against any such catastrophe. Therefore, the department has stimulated and speeded up production in this country. Although we felt reasonably safe that productions would not need to begin on quantity basis until the 1st of January, 1919, according to all human calculation, we have speeded up production in this country so that deliveries are actually beginning now. During this fall we shall accumulate in the training camps of the Nation material which we will not need to send abroad. This material which is now being accumulated will be used primarily for training purposes in this country.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can the gentleman explain why it was not thought necessary to have quantity production until January, 1919? We will then have been nearly two years at war. I understand the gentleman to say it is not necessary to have a quantity production of artillery earlier than January, 1919. Why not?

Mr. BORLAND. I think I have made that clear.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It is not clear to me. We have already——

Mr. BORLAND. Does not an army need artillery? The fact that 30 divisions were expected to be in France and have their equipment provided for under the French contract relieved us from what, of course, would have been a very difficult problem to solve under the best circumstances. But the danger that that arrangement could not be carried out or that some totally unforeseen emergency might occur dictated that a part of the time we should be ready to take the burden on our own shoulders, if necessary.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman and I do not stand on the same plank. I am not speaking of the French contract. It is a splendid thing, surely, that the French were in position to give us the helping hand at the early period of the war, and we ought to be profoundly grateful to them for it. To me it is a matter of humiliation that we were in position where we had to look to the French for this aid.

Mr. BORLAND. I regret the gentleman is humiliated, but so far up to date he is the only gentleman who is humiliated. Neither the French nor we felt any humiliation.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am sorry for the gentleman. He is usually very keen. He is certainly out of touch with the American people. Ninety-nine per cent of them have the same sentiment and feeling that I have just expressed.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am not mistaken. I know I am not.

Mr. BORLAND. I can not yield to the gentleman for an expression of opinion.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I understand the gentleman should not. If the gentleman will be so kind, I would like to get my question before him, and I know he will be pleased to answer it. Can the gentleman inform the committee when contracts were let by our Government?

Mr. BORLAND. I can not only inform the gentleman, but if he will read the hearings he can see the information given in detail.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I have read the report of the committee through, but the gentleman has just stated that the hearings are available.

Mr. BORLAND. They are available. The gentleman will find in the appendix to those hearings a list of every artillery manufacturing contract made by the department, every shell contract, every explosive contract, the date when the work was authorized, and when the contract was signed. Now, that answers the question as to when orders were given. As to when deliveries were given, I have already told him that I would not answer that.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The purpose of inquiry was not to embarrass the gentleman.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman's inquiry does not embarrass the gentleman. I foresaw that kind of a question and answered it fully in the printed hearings.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. What I want to know is how much of the $3,000,000,000, appropriated last year, has been spent and what the results are?

Mr. BORLAND. I will confine my answer to that. I will say that not a great percentage of the $3,000,000,000 appropriated last year has been expended, for the good reason that the amount that has been expended was paid out for facilities of manufacture and not in paying for the completed goods. The contracts for completed goods are now maturing. A large percentage of the $3,000,000,000 is on hand, a fact which the committee took into consideration in making these estimates.

Now, as to the question of the American people being humiliated by our buying guns in France, I went last April, in a bond campaign, to the business men of Kansas City and told them frankly what the situation was, and to a man the business men approved that arrangement. They said that the department and Congress would have been subject to criticism if we had taken any other course, which I am satisfied is the case.

Now, gentlemen, in order to develop quantity production it has been necessary to turn a peaceful nation into a warlike nation, a matter not easy. It has been necessary to develop gun forgings in this country upon a footing never attempted before. It has been necessary to develop the forging and machining of shells and the making of cartridge cases on a basis never attempted before. In order to do that it has been necessary to commandeer, practically, and to enlist the efforts of a large number of factories engaged in metal-working business, such as automobile factories, road-scraper factories, sewing-machine factories, and a great many other factories of different kinds, and put them upon munition work. I want the House to understand frankly that situation, too, and therefore I have put into the hearings a list of every factory in the United States that has received any advance or aid from the Federal Government, and the exact amount of aid received, and the kind of work they are doing. The gentleman from Minnesota will find that information fully stated in the hearings.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am interested very much to know whether a large proportion of the present appropriation is to be used in the manufacture of very large caliber, long-range guns.

Mr. BORLAND. It is.

Mr. McKENZIE. Or is the great bulk to be used in field guns, which I understand we need above all?

Mr. BORLAND. There is in here, I will say to the gentleman, a program for large-caliber, long-range guns; but in point of expense it does not bear a very important relation to the total amount expended for artillery. The big amount expended for artillery, as the gentleman knows, is for the ordinary field equipment used by the battery and division. The 75-millimeter gun, the 3-inch gun, is the "boy" that does the work. That is where our money goes and where our work and effort are going. That is the gun that is used against personnel. Then we Americans have the 4.7, which is not comparable with what is used in other armies, but which our officers think very well of, and then we have the 155-milimeter guns and the 155-millimeter howitzer. Those are the guns used against the personnel.

Then, in addition to that, we have guns ranging from 8 to 9½ and 10 inches, which are occasionally used against personnel or heavy intrenchments, but are not primarily guns to kill men with. Their cost is very high, and the amount of damage done by them to troops is not very large. Then, from 10 to 14 inch guns and 16-inch mortars, we have a program of big guns. I might as well cover that point fully, now that we are started on it. Our great reliance for trench work and open-country fighting is these guns ranging from 75 to 155 millimeters, with the supplemental work of those running up to 9½ inches. All of those that are not used primarily against personnel are used against intrenched positions. Then we have the big guns, of which we have three sources of supply.

In the first place, we have all the guns the Navy can spare, and we have inserted a provision in this bill permitting the Secretary of the Navy to transfer to the Secretary of War certain guns in Navy stock. Some of these guns are short-range, obsolete guns, not suitable for the equipment of an American battleship, but they can be mounted on caterpillar or railroad mounts and made mobile, and are very useful in the field. Then we have a number of Navy guns which formed the spare or reserve stock of the American fleet and which will not form the needed equipment of any American vessel. The Navy spared the Army as many of those as are needed, and the amount, not given in the bill, is about a total of $5,000,000 worth of those guns.

Then we have a supply of larger guns taken from the Coast Artillery. There is always a reserve stock of guns carried for the coast defenses. Some are the guns that have not been placed in position. Some are reserve guns of Coast Artillery, guns that are intended to be used to replace others while undergoing repair or relining.

We have taken 5 and 6 inch guns, coast-defense guns, somewhat outgrown in coast-defense work, and they are being mounted on caterpillar or railroad mounts, and are thus being made available for the big-gun program.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I presume that the purpose of sending over these very heavy guns and the manufacture of others at this time is to use them when the allies take the offensive. As defensive guns they would, of course, be of little avail. Is that true?

Mr. BORLAND. My private opinion agrees with that of the gentleman.

Mr. McKENZIE. But when we get the Germans back to the Rhine and we want to blow up some of their munition plants and gun factories from long-range positions, then we can utilize those heavy guns?

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman's private surmise entirely agrees with mine. I, of course, am not authorized to make any official statement on the subject. I am authorized simply to indicate what the big guns can be used for, and what the small guns can be used for, and we can all draw our own inference from the fact that we are providing for the big guns.

In addition to the big-gun program that I have spoken of for the Navy and the Artillery, we contemplate in this program the manufacture of large guns. That is quite an extensive big-gun program—12 and 14 inch guns and 16-inch howitzers. To do that we must build what the newspapers call an "American Krupps"; that is, we must build a Government arsenal for the manufacture of guns from the steel ingot up to the finished weapon, or, possibly, even from the iron ore up to the finished weapon. That plant will be built on an island in the Ohio River below Pittsburgh. It will absorb as much as possible of the skilled workers in steel in that vicinity, and the perfection of organization and the assembling of personnel will be possible there under conditions more favorable than those presented by any other situation.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BORLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. How long will it take before this plant will be ready to go to work?

Mr. BORLAND. I can only state what the evidence shows. I myself could hazard no judgment about that, but they contemplate that they will be able to turn out the pilot guns by July, 1919. Whether that is the case or not, I do not know. That opinion does not seem to be agreed upon by all of them, and I think that is a rather rosy estimate.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is not the gentleman of the opinion that it will be not earlier than January, 1920?

Mr. BORLAND. There are a good many opinions on that. If it is as early as January, 1920, possibly it will be early enough.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Certainly the gentleman does not intend to convey the idea that we are depending upon the construction of that plant for a source of big-gun supply?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not know whether the gentleman is trying just to heckle me or whether I have not made myself clear to him. I have already stated that we were not depending upon it; that we had two sources from which to obtain big guns which are quite ample compared with the resources of other nations of the world. We have a good many big guns that other people have not got.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The price that was mentioned in the papers was fabulous, and justified only because essential to the winning of this war. If this plant can not be constructed on this tremendous scale in time to help win the war, the enormous expenditure is not justified.

Mr. BORLAND. Of course, we are not depending upon any sudden collapse of the enemy. We are not underestimating the difficulties. It would not be the part of wisdom to underestimate either the delay or the difficulties in winning this war. We are not going to delay the construction of a big-gun arsenal because, forsooth, we might not begin to get the guns for 18 months, because in 18 months we may be more sorely in need of the guns than we are at present. We are going right ahead with the program of the work of winning this war if it should take 10 years to do it, and the sooner the world finds out that Uncle Sam is in this war in earnest, that he is going to win it, that there is no other outcome but the complete victory of the American forces, then the sooner the war may, happily, be over.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think so.

Mr. BORLAND. And if that time comes any sooner than we expect, the gentleman from Minnesota and myself will rejoice together that our guns will have become useless. But we are not depending upon that hope.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. We are agreed as to that, but one gun now may be worth ten guns in 1920.

Mr. BORLAND. We are getting every gun that is available.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I think the chairman has anticipated my question, and partially answered it, but what I want to know is concerning this establishment that is to rival the Krupps establishment in Germany. I saw that statement in the paper and it interested me.

Mr. BORLAND. The newspapers have called it an American Krupps. It is even better than that, for, instead of being a private monopoly under Government patronage, it is a Government arsenal, and we expect to make these guns only for the United States.

Mr. FESS. There is really no limitaton?

Mr. BORLAND. It is not in any sense an American Krupps. It is a Government arsenal.

Mr. FESS. And there is no limitation on the time as to when it is to be completed?

Mr. BORLAND. No; we are putting ourselves on such an absolutely independent basis that we shall be able to cope with any situation that comes up.

Mr. FESS. I think it is wise to start out with that idea.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman from Ohio realizes that when we entered this war there were only two establishments in the United States able to forge big guns, Midvale and Bethlehem. They were forging guns also for the Navy, and I think they were doing some work for outside countries. We were absolutely dependent upon those two establishments. It is rather an amazing fact that the department has been able to handle the situation under those circumstances as well as it has been able to handle it. It required a good deal of patience and cooperation. We want to be independent, if we can, of private manufacturers for the things necessary for the defense of the life of the Nation.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HICKS. Does any amount carried in this bill contemplate the loan of any money by the Government to either the Bethlehem or the Midvale plant to enlarge their output?

Mr. BORLAND. A very little was advanced to the Bethlehem and Midvale. The gentleman will see by a comparison of that list in the back of the hearings that it is a very trifling amount compared with the enormous contracts which they hold. It was only for some incidental machine tools or something of that kind that we let them have. We are not loaning them money in advance. We are loaning money to some of the smaller manufacturers, but not to the Bethlehem or Midvale.

Mr. HICKS. Does the gentleman think those two plants, Bethlehem and Midvale, will be able to finance themselves and produce guns in sufficient capacity?

Mr. BORLAND. Oh, yes; they are doing it. They are handling all their contracts, and doing it very creditably.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it the hope of the Military Committee to ultimately have the Government manufacture all of the war material in times of peace?

Mr. BORLAND. I am speaking for the Appropriation Committee. I will say that the Appropriation Committee has universally encouraged the upbuilding of Government arsenals. We do not want to put private manufacturers out of business, because we want an expansive force. We do not want to have the Government arsenals enlarged to such an extent as will drive private manufacturers out of business, and then when we need to expand be confined to what we have in times of peace. And yet we have control of the situation by the manufacture of sufficient supplies at Government arsenals. It gives us an opportunity to know what the cost of the manufacture of each constituent article is and so to regulate the price paid to private makers.

Mr. KNUTSON. I think that is desirable.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. EMERSON. Is the Government to own the plant to be erected near Pittsburgh to the extent of transacting the entire business?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; all of it.

Mr. EMERSON. The gentleman mentioned that we were to do away with horse-drawn artillery and substitute motor artillery. Is that being carried out to a general extent?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; and will be carried out completely. The reason of that is that it is not possible to maintain horses in large numbers abroad. The shipment of forage introduces a problem that we ought not to assume at this time.

Mr. EMERSON. Is the motor-driven artillery just as good as the horse-drawn artillery?

Mr. BORLAND. The motor vehicles are better. They are more expensive to begin with, but better in the long run.

We have not only the wheel trucks, but we have the caterpillars and also the larger guns on railways, and they are the better in every respect. I might say in reference to the subject that, of course, the motorized vehicles require a certain upkeep and repair kits and movable forges. I found, in going through the bill, that they had estimated for the same wastage in these motor upkeeps and repair kits for guns behind the lines as they had for guns on the firing line. I called the attention of the War Department officials to the fact that the percentage of the destruction of guns—the capture, and so forth—at the front did not necessarily apply to all of the equipment they had back of the line. They took back their estimates, refigured them, and reduced them to one-quarter of the percentage they had before.

There are two advantages in such a careful revision of estimates. It reduces the demands on the American manufacturer and the number of kits and reduces the number of noncombatants to man them. Experience has demonstrated that we get more out of the motorized equipment, and that is the easiest thing that we can provide.

Now, gentlemen, what I have said applies to the gun program, and a similar line of thought would apply to the shell and ammunition program.

The committee has felt that the House was entitled to absolute knowledge of all these contracts, and a list is printed in the back part of the hearings. We may all say that we can look back over the contracts and improve on them. Goodness knows that there is not a man in this room who would not admit that he could improve on them. Of course there has been a large change in the organization and personnel of the War Department. Some of these contracts were made by men who are no longer in control, and yet the proof of the pudding is in the eating of it. There is only one way to find out whether we can actually lick the enemy, and that is to get the arms and munitions. The contracts have resulted in getting the goods. I have no doubt that in some of the contracts our officers are more liberal than they will be in the future. There is one thing to be said about these contracts—they are all of comparatively short duration and all provide for a renewal at the option of the Federal Government on much more favorable terms for the Government. So I doubt whether in the chaos existing last year contracts could have been made which would do the amount of work, produce the goods, stimulate production eagerly and earnestly on more favorable terms or such as would be made ordinarily in cold-blooded business dealings in times of peace.

If gentlemen undertake to attack the contracts, I do not propose to defend them. I have my own opinion about some of them. The result is that the contracts were entered into, and we are enjoying the proceeds, and we are now preparing to rebuild on the foundation we have already laid, and to the advantage of Uncle Sam.

In addition I want to call attention to the explosive program. We have control of the entire explosives in this country. No allies can get powder except through us. That is necessary for our own safety and for their convenience. There was a time when the allies were paying a dollar a pound for ordinary smokeless powder. Before the war we were paying only 53 cents a pound, and when I first came here we paid 61 cents a pound.

But I doubt whether we could have gone out into the market and contracted for a supply of powder to the enormous extent we needed on any terms that we would have been willing to ratify. We did not go into the market to contract for it. The department did the wise thing in developing its own plants. It has developed its plants not only for powder but for nitrates and other explosives—T. N. T., T. N. A., nitrostarch, C. O., L. 3, E. L. 104, and all explosives which you gentlemen have heard of and probably know as much about as I do, and possibly a little bit more. This is the important fact, however, that you will want to know: We are laying here the foundation to make ourselves absolutely independent, not only in the production of powder but in the production of the ingredients of powder, including the great basic product of nitrate. We can not afford to lose a single nitrate factory in the United States; and if there is any place on earth that nitrate can be produced, we all realize that we must utilize that facility. We want to get on an independent basis at the earliest possible moment. Whether we agree or not to the location of certain plants or the contracts under which they are made, the ultimate result is that we must be on an independent basis first, then we will be able to figure on advantageous terms to a much better advantage.

As to powder, I think we are on a fair way to be quite well equipped. We have a plant at Charleston, W. Va., producing powder. We have one at Nashville, Tenn., of which the first unit came in two or three weeks ago, and a second unit now is about to operate—actually producing powder. It was very quick construction. Something less than 90 days were employed in producing that plant. The department is contemplating a third powder plant. The estimates originally called for $30,000,000 to increase the Du Pont plant at Carneys Point. After consultation upon that subject, we decided not to increase that private plant, but to save the $30,000,000 and then take $15,000,000 estimated for a powder plant at Muscle Shoals, and combine those two and make a $45,000,000 plant, which is the only kind of a plant which can be advantageously worked on high production. That plant has not been located, and the situation is such now that it is not absolutely certain that we will locate that plant. In other words, we may have the situation in hand. But if Gen. Pershing sends in a recommendation indicating that the plant is needed, then the two appropriations are combined to make a $45,000,000 plant. If that is done, we will be thoroughly independent upon the subject of powder.

Mr. KNUTSON. What percentage is the Government manufacturing now?

Mr. BORLAND. Of powder?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. The Government has only begun the manufacture of powder in these new plants. We had a little plant at Picatinny Arsenal, where they turned out about 11,000 pounds a day, but that does not amount to anything in war. That Government plant was in order to fix a basic price which we would pay when we bought powder from private makers.

Mr. KNUTSON. What percentage is it contemplated to manufacture?

Mr. BORLAND. I will say that these two plants will manufacture about two-fifths of our powder needs, and that practically three-fifths come from private manufacturers. Of these three-fifths more than 90 per cent come from the Du Pont people. The Hercules and the Aetna divide the other 10 per cent. Those are the only three concerns that know how to make powder. When these plants are constructed, we shall have a force of expert powder makers in the Government arsenals.

I want to refer only to one other item that I know will be important in the consideration of this House. We have a proving ground at Sandy Hook, but it is no longer available under modern conditions of commerce, and we must withdraw from it at the earliest practicable moment. We authorized a proving ground at Savannah, Ill. That is available for small field artillery, such as is manufactured at the Rock Island Arsenal, at the Illinois Steel Works, and at Minneapolis and many other places in that vicinity. It is not available for big guns and some of the work that is done in the East—is not available for the big shells. This House defeated an attempt to build a proving ground at Kent Island. Thereupon the department built a proving ground at Aberdeen, Md. There we have a total length of 18 miles, a total width of 7 miles, and a total acreage of 35,000. Some of it is good land, but a large part of it is swamp and overflowed land and water land. On that land they have constructed a modern proving ground, one of the best and most amply equipped, where our men are working days, nights, and Sundays.

Yesterday our committee went down there. It is the second visit that I have made, and I want to say that it is marvelous what they have done. We did not get title and possession of that ground until the 15th of January, 1918. Two months ago I was down there and they had the proving ground in operation. To-day they have an enormous amount of work going on, and if my friend from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] and others will go down there, they will see guns coming there in quantity production, 6-inch guns and 75-millimeter guns being actually delivered. Every gun tube is tested and every gun carriage is tested, not necessarily together. One-tenth of one per cent of all of the shells are tested.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is it expected that this proving ground will take the place of the one at Sandy Hook permanently?

Mr. BORLAND. It will. We are using Sandy Hook to capacity, but we must get away from there at the earliest possible moment. We will withdraw from Sandy Hook and concentrate our efforts at Aberdeen.

This proving ground tests one-tenth of one per cent of all the delivery of shells. That is extremely important, because a large number of people are making these shells, attempting to comply with the specifications. Shell making is a dangerous thing. If a shell explodes prematurely in the gun it is very dangerous, and these shells must be thoroughly tested.

This proving ground is in the very center of the great shell and ammunition making district of this country. It is possible now to start a truck loaded with shells from some of the munition factories after lunch time and drive all the afternoon and night and reach Aberdeen by early morning. That is practically the only way in which these shells can be taken through, because to ship them by express or the railroad involves delay and danger. By taking them by truck they can be gotten through at once. Nobody wants that truck to stop at any town or inn, so it must keep on going. In the morning when the truck reaches Aberdeen the shells are tested and by long-distance telephone the manager of the factory is notified of the result. He does not lose a day's work of his factory or material put in the shells, because if there is anything wrong it is immediately corrected. The advantage is that the contractor is able to keep up with the contracts and the Government is able to get prompt deliveries. Every Member of this House, I think, would be very much interested to go down there and see the machinery of preparation for war in operation. It would clear up a great many of these questions which I know are natural to your minds. You would see what it is that occurs and just where the stress and importance lies, and then you would be able to determine the character and extent of the theory upon which this bill is drawn.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. ROBBINS. I was very much interested in the gentleman's statement in reference to the Aberdeen Proving Ground, but is not that a great distance, say, from Neville Island, below Pittsburgh, where they are going to make ordnance? Would it not be better to have a plant nearer to the manufacture of ordnance?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not think that would be important, because the guns have to be shipped and the department might just as well turn them into the proving ground on the way to the seaboard, as the case may be. The Aberdeen plant is very well located, extremely well located under present circumstances, and I do not think there could be a better place in the country.

Mr. ROBBINS. But in the mountain regions of western Pennsylvania there could be easily obtained a long range for the testing of heavy ordnance built at Neville Island. That is the thought I had in mind.

Mr. BORLAND. It seems to be extremely difficult to get a proper location for a proving ground. Nobody welcomes a proving ground. It is one piece of pork nobody wants to take, but is willing to leave to the other fellow.

Mr. BROWNING. Is Aberdeen and Magnolia one and the same place?

Mr. BORLAND. I think not.

Mr. BROWNING. There is an explosive plant going down from Magnolia, I understand——

Mr. BORLAND. Aberdeen is the first station this side of Havre de Grace.

Mr. BROWNING. Magnolia is this side——

Mr. BORLAND. There is the gas filling that is going in at the Edgewood Arsenal. I have not mentioned that, but I will not discuss that at any length.

Mr. WALDOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. WALDOW. The gentleman has made a very interesting and frank statement, and I was wondering whether he had any information relative to the reason we are able to obtain cannon from France cheaper than we can manufacture them in this country?

Mr. BORLAND. Well, France had a certain amount of surplus labor we did not have. Her peasants came in from the fields at the beginning of this war. Her women and children had to go to work to keep them from starvation. She had a certain amount of surplus labor. Under the threat of the Germans at her very throat, bombarding her very capital, she increased her production of guns and munitions to a very high intensity. In order to produce enough guns to meet the German Army she had to make her productions up to a point which her wastage would not justify. So she got to the point where she produced more guns than could be employed by her army, and it was a question either of shutting down the factories, disbanding her workmen, or filling our orders. She could produce more than she could consume in the field, and she was glad to make terms to supply us. The terms were low. They were terms that perhaps would not have been forced upon her, but she was glad to make them.

Mr. WALDOW. The gentleman, I hope, will understand I am not criticizing the action of the purchase, but I was wondering what conditions entered into the facts in this case.

Mr. BORLAND. France was facing the foe under conditions where she had to produce munitions in enormous quantities, and in order to do that she had to call women from the kitchens and peasants from the field and put them in munition factories. Then when she met that condition she found the wastage in the field did not consume the production of those factories. In this case France herself offered to supply us, and we would have been subject to the most justifiable criticism if we failed to cooperate with her. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield before leaving the floor? Does the gentleman care to state how many forms of gases we are using?

Mr. BORLAND. No; I would not care to state that, but I will be glad to give the gentleman that information, which I can give him at any time.

Mr. FESS. I have understood that the Germans are using 20 different kinds of gases.

Mr. BORLAND. I may say we are using the Bureau of Mines and the Bureau of Standards and the experts of our Ordnance Department in following up that development, and I think we are doing it fairly successfully.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Before the gentleman concludes, could I make another inquiry?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think there is plenty of time, no doubt. I think maybe the gentleman could get what I have in mind better if I made this one statement. I personally am of the opinion that our production of artillery has been the most gigantic failure of our entire military operations, and I have abundant reason for that statement. I may be wrong, but that is my firm belief. Are we recouping, are we taking steps, if that should be the case, such as to retrieve the situation?

Mr. BORLAND. Bless my soul, I can reassure the gentleman heartily. In the first place, the gentleman is largely mistaken in his belief.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman is not mistaken. I will state that flatly.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman and I differ very materially about that, and I am sorry he did not have the advantage of the hearings before the committee.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I had some advantages that maybe the gentleman has not had. Admiting that is true, will the gentleman answer the question?

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman will anwswer the question in this way: We are providing and have the facilities in sight to comply with this program, and this program is larger than any program that has ever been attempted for any army in the field.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I am correct. If this program is carried out, we shall have for the initial equipment of the American Army all that was ever provided for the initial equipment of the German Army and more than ever was provided for the initial equipment of any other army. We shall have for replacement and renewal a higher percentage than for any other army; and if we fail at all, we have such a margin for replacement and percentage that we could fail a good deal and still produce enough for the initial equipment. I am not sure but that we have overestimated the percentage on renewals and replacements, and I am glad if we have, because I will say frankly to the gentleman that in my mind there was a subconscious feeling that we might not be providing only for three armies. It was that subconscious feeling that led me to be liberal in all these percentages, because I am confident the percentages are large for the present force. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HELM having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10854) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, had further insisted on its amendments numbered 5, 23, 34, 35, 37, 38, 39, 41, 42, 47, 52, 53, 93, 100, 102, 112, 115, 120, and 170, still in disagreement, had agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. TILLMAN, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. PENROSE, and Mr. LODGE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate Resolution 266.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
June 24, 1918.

Whereas H. R. 9248, a bill "To prevent extortion, to impose taxes upon certain incomes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," duly passed by the House of Representatives March 12, 1918, was considered in the Senate and passed with a reported amendment in the nature of a substitute May 11, 1918; and

Whereas on said May 11, 1918, a conference was asked and managers on the part of the Senate were appointed thereon; and

Whereas on June 14, 1918, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the House of Representatives called said bill from the Speaker's table, and made thereon certain remarks seriously reflecting upon the honor and integrity of the Senate, as appears on pages 8452 to 8457 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and

Whereas subsequently on said June 14, 1918, managers were appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, of whom said chairman of said committee was one; and

Whereas said chairman of said House committee subsequently sent to each manager on the part of the Senate under date of June 19, 1918, the following letter:

"COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
"Washington, D. C., June 19, 1918.

"DEAR SIR: I write to advise you that on the 14th instant the House agreed to the request made by the Senate for a conference on H. R. 9248, the antiprofiteering rent bill, and that Messrs. CROSSER, of Ohio; CARY, of Wisconsin; and myself were appointed conferees on the part of the House. And, further, to advise you that we will meet the Senate conferees at such time and place that will be most agreeable to the Senate conferees.

"In order to facilitate matters I am inviting the attention of each of the Senate conferees to some of the more important questions of difference which will arise in conference by sending in advance a list of questions inquiring as to the attitude of the Senate conferees concerning each. The questions mentioned are herewith inclosed.

"Very truly, yours,

(Signed) "BEN JOHNSON.

"1. Are you unalterable in your purpose to create a rent administrator?

"2. If so, are you unalterable in your purpose not to intrust the work with anyone unless he be a resident of the District of Columbia?

"3. Are you unalterable in your purpose not to permit the President to select a rent administrator for the District of Columbia just as he selected a Food Administrator and Fuel Administrator, i. e., without your consent and approval?

"4. Are you unalterable in your seeming purpose to permit profiteering in house rents by imposing a fine less than the amount of the profiteering? Or will you accept some plan like that recently suggested by the President in his message to Congress whereby all the money taken in a profiteering transaction shall be surrendered?

"5. Are you unalterable in your adherence to that part of the Senate bill which would compel the tenant to leave his work as often and as long as it would be necessary for him to leave it in order to prosecute or defend the several appeals allowed?

"6. Are you unalterable in your purpose not to fix a gross return to the landlord, but, instead, to give him a 'net' return, notwithstanding the fact that thereby the landlord would have no interest whatever in keeping down the operating expenses of the premises?

"7. Are you unalterable in your purpose to saddle upon the tenant the cost of permanent street and similar improvements to the real estate alone, notwithstanding the fact that the erstwhile tenant enjoys the building alone?

"8. Are you unalterable in your purpose to compel the tenant to account for 'vacancies' in the house and 'depreciation' of the house; and not allow himself to offset that by the growing increase in the value of the land upon which the house stands?

"9. Are you unalterable in your purpose to permit a landlord to profiteer with a business house because it may once have been used as a residence?

"10. Are you unalterable in your purpose to fasten the present annual rates of rental on the tenant by fixing the rates in effect on the 1st day of last October as a basis?

"11. Are you unalterable in your purpose that the rental for furniture shall be as much as 30 per cent of its value?

"12. Are you unalterable in your seeming purpose not to punish profiteering corporations to the same extent that you would individuals who profiteer?

"13. Are you unalterable in your seeming purpose to exempt 'the original landlord' from all the provisions of the bill by your definition of 'landlord'?

"14. If you are unalterable in your seeming purpose to adhere to the remedy of 'fine' instead of that of 'taxation,' as set out in the bill passed by the House, would you be in favor of having a fine levied on all those who violate any provision of the act, or would you insist upon limiting it to those only who 'evade or attempt to evade its provisions'?"

And

Whereas on June 21, 1918, said chairman of said House committee sent to each of the managers on the part of the Senate the following letter:

"COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
"Washington, D. C., June 21, 1918.

"To the SENATE CONFEREES ON H. R. 9248
(the antiprofiteering rent bill),

"GENTLEMEN: The Washington newspapers of yesterday contained the statement that at least some of the Senate conferees on the antiprofiteering rent bill contemplated having me denied the privileges of the Senate floor because of the criticism made by me of the Senate amendment which has come to be known as the 'Pomerene bill.'

"I do not care a continental about that—run along and get through with it, and then permit the Senate to vote on a measure that will prevent the profiteers from driving nearly a thousand war workers out of Washington every week. I am not interested in the least in your undertaking to deny me the privileges of the Senate Chamber, but I am deeply concerned for the war worker, who is being robbed and then sent out of Washington, and because of which our boys in France must suffer.

"The newspaper articles referred to state also that at least some of the Senate conferees may decline to go into conference because I am one of the House conferees. May I not suggest that by such a course, either intentionally or unintentionally, you play right into the hands of the profiteers, as delay in the passage of a good bill is what they seek?

"May I not also suggest that your skins should be thicker, or your bill better? I not only invite the severest criticism of all my official acts, but I am quite anxious, indeed, to have the acid test applied to my endeavors in this particular matter, and you will not only not offend me but you will do me a favor by wading into both me and it without gloves, since I, and not the landlords, am its author.

"This is not a time for 'senatorial dignity' but one for action. Rearing back on your 'pastern joints' don't get the oppressed tenants anything. I do not intend to permit your attitude toward me, because of my criticism of your 'rotten' bill, to in the least deter me in my efforts to prevent the profiteer from fattening off of your country's needs.

"Your amendment—the Pomerene bill—had to be criticized, 'senatorial dignity' to the contrary notwithstanding.

"My contempt for such of you as may resort to pretext to evade full responsibility for not giving our war workers protection from the miserable profiteers is just as great as yours may be for me; but as I said, that shall not stop me from following my plain duty in the premises.

"Let us get to work on the bill, and then you can have your revenge on me to your hearts' content. You have my full consent to deny me the privileges of the Senate Chamber, or even to take your spite out of my hide, if you will only go ahead and let the Senate vote on a good bill instead of a subterfuge.

"While I am sending this letter to each of the conferees, it is really intended for those only who are responsible for the article in yesterday afternoon's local newspapers.

"Very truly, yours,

(Signed) "BEN JOHNSON."

And

Whereas on June 22, 1918, the said chairman of said House committee presented the foregoing letters to the House of Representatives, and in presenting them used the following language:

"I take it for granted that the thought of 'ousting' me from the Senate Chamber is the result of a close association with those who have been 'ousting' the Government workers from houses in the District of Columbia."

Therefore be it

Resolved, That the conferees on the part of the Senate on said bill be, and they are hereby, excused from further service as such conferees until otherwise ordered by the Senate; and that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to transmit a copy of this resolution to the House of Representatives.

Attest:

JAMES M. BAKER, Secretary.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the country is certainly to be congratulated upon the introduction of this bill.

It is only two years ago that a like bill appropriated a one-hundredth as much as this bill, and the proportion allowed for the vital items of field artillery and siege guns was a great deal less than one-hundredth. The bill now is rightly framed, so as to provide immediately for the forces that are likely to be called upon; as I understand it, three armies, over 4,000,000 men. The bill then was framed to provide by installment, going through a period of years—I think seven—for 700,000 men, who might be our first line of defense; and that was the principle maintained by the Chief of Ordnance, although the war in Europe had been going on for over two years. At that time the few of us who thought that we ought to prepare for war in order to keep peace, those of us who urged that it was the strong man armed who kept his household in peace, could obtain but a baker's dozen for any effort to amend the estimates and increase our reserve of arms so that we should be sure that when our armies were called into the field they should not be like those of Great Britain and of Russia, young men thronging to the defense of their country without arms in their hands. And I congratulate the country that we now report results in a bill that at least appropriates enough to engage all the facilities for manufacture that this country can expect to have for the next year.

Mr. Chairman, my time runs fast when I speak on this. As to field guns, there is some history. I remember when for 10 years—it is over 10 years ago—we had not a single mount for a field gun that provided for recoil. We knew the French had such carriages. We were trying to get them, and our Ordnance Department reported that they were still an experiment. Some of us remember a dozen years ago when one of our officers went to France, and dared not return there because he was said to have brought away some of the secrets of the French gun. We all remember that more recently we were given the right to make that French gun—the best in the world. That was since the war broke out, and we waited seven months before we adopted a pattern, because we thought we could make a better gun. At last we found out that we could not make a better one, and are now going to work to manufacture some of these guns to take care of our soldiers in the field. Congratulations to the administration and congratulations to the committee that that course has been adopted and that we are at work! [Applause.]

As to siege guns, at the time of the Spanish War, or shortly afterwards, that great soldier, Gen. Miles, found that we had not a single siege gun, and I remember the mount of a large howitzer upon a wagon standing some 10 feet high, so that it would have turned over at any sort of ditch. That was the only siege gun possessed by the American Army. Nevertheless,

America was in the van in the production of modern siege guns. The howitzer, so called now, is a gun of high elevation, which, like a mortar, throws a large shell into the air, and it was adopted by America before any other nations for the armament of our fortifications, in order that its plunging shot upon the unprotected decks of ironclads would destroy those vessels. It is our own system which has been adopted from us by the Germans for the destruction of iron-arched fortifications in the towns of Belgium. America was first. America had no carriages for these guns, and the carriages are almost of more importance than the gun. But America was the first to adopt the caterpillar traction which now draws these guns. Now we are told that at last we are getting results. Many guns that we have are not suitable for battleships, because not intended to pierce modern armor, but they are long enough and strong and good enough for the field purposes for which they will be employed, and guns from our forts and our ships and others that are being made are now being properly mounted, so that they can be used either from railway tracks or by caterpillar traction in the field for the destruction of the enemy.

I know something about those guns. I have not been in actual battle, but our party, when abroad, was under the great shells that were thrown over our heads, while our aeroplanes circling about over the enemy's lines were finding out where the shots fell and whether they hit the places aimed at. Those airplanes were surrounded by black-smoke explosions showing where the German shrapnel had been aimed at them and had not hit them. Every now and then a shell from the enemy would also pass over our heads, but fortunately they did not know where our own heavy piece was hidden and camouflaged in its emplacement. Siege guns are used on these lines. It may be doubtful if they are of great value except in besieging a fortification, but our modern army will be a modern army by virtue of possessing all types of artillery, if it is to be an army at all.

Now, one word more. I think my time is up, but I can not refrain from saying one word as to labor. This country must abandon all work that is unnecessary if it is going to do the work of this war. We shall not have as much man power left after we send our millions into the field. We have a great deal more to do in war than we had to do in peace. All American invention, all American organization, all the aid that can be got from men and from women will not suffice to do the work in time (and work that is not in time is worse than none at all, because it is useless and you spend the money for naught)—these, I say, will not suffice unless we learn that all the energy of this country must be put to work in this war, just as I have seen it put forth in the great works on the Clyde, where thousands of women were managing their lathes and turning out shells that weigh 300 pounds apiece and that were lifted by a crane moved by a lever in the hands of a woman. Some of them weighed up to 2,000 pounds. That work was done by the dear women of the country who had just been taught how, done by leave of the loyal workmen of their country who had given up all their trade-union rules as to the work of women and apprentices, and as to work done in ways other than union ways; done by the aid and consent of the whole population, in order that they might win this war, as we must win it, on our line of defense, which lies in the battle lines of Europe. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield so much of my time as may be desired to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I shall consume all of the time that the gentleman from Missouri has given me. At the outset I want to congratulate this subcommittee on the work it has accomplished in preparing and presenting this bill to the House. In fact, the subcommittee has been extremely active and painstaking in the preparation of this bill. It is a highly technical bill and one where the members of the committee must rely largely upon the experts in the War Department as to the kind of artillery and guns needed; but they have succeeded in presenting a splendid bill to the House.

The chairman of the full committee [Mr. SHERLEY] was for many years the chairman of this Subcommittee on Fortifications, and, in my judgment, outside of the experts in the War Department, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations at this time is the best-posted man on fortifications and mobile artillery in the country, and the committee had his assistance in making up the bill.

May I be permitted to say, in reference to the whole Committee on Appropriations, that during the time that the country has been at war it would be most difficult to determine to which party any member of that committee belongs? In fact, the Appropriations Committee is, as a rule, a nonpartisan committee even in time of peace.

The chairman of the committee at the outbreak of the war was Mr. Fitzgerald. His services were testified to by the House in a marked way when he resigned. He was succeeded by the gentleman from Kentucky. His ability, his great devotion to duty, has made the departure of his very able predecessor not so much missed by the House. It is the most important committee in the House, in times of peace doing more work than any other committee, but since the declaration of war even the membership of the House are not familiar with the enormous amount of detail and the enormous amount of work which this committee has to perform. In the preparation of all the bills reported by this committee, from the chairman of the committee down, each and every member of that committee has been patriotic. There has been absolutely no partisanship in the committee in making up any of these bills. In going through these great demands upon the Treasury it requires a great deal of patience and a great deal of unremitting toil to be able to understand just exactly where you may cut an appropriation without in any way impairing the efficiency of the Government.

The policy which I have always pursued in times of peace has been to require the Government to show clearly the need of the money asked before I would vote to grant it. But in time of war I have given the Government the benefit of all doubt and voted the money. In the preparation of these war supply bills I did not deny the Army or Navy a single dollar that they needed.

Yet I can safely say we have saved many millions of dollars without in any sense of the word impairing the efficiency of the Government.

I have not made a speech except directly upon the bills under consideration for some time, but I at this time want to talk about a few matters not bearing directly upon the bill now under consideration.

Since the declaration of war, the marked unanimity in this Congress in backing up the administration has been almost a miracle. Occasionally a little politics will creep in, but there has been less politics in this House since the declaration of war than perhaps in any deliberative body among all the nations that are now at war.

You Republicans ought to be congratulated on your loyalty and on your support of all the administration measures, with but few exceptions, for it is so hard for Republicans not to play politics all the time. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the work done by this administration and the Congress sets the record for the Republic. No Congress in the history of any nation has done more than the last two Congresses. I will mention very briefly some accomplishments of this Democratic Congress prior to the declaration of war.

TARIFF.

The first great piece of legislation after Wilson's election was the revision of the tariff. This was a splendid piece of legislation and was meeting the expectations of its friends when the European war broke out. This, of course, disturbed our trade relations with all the world. But its aim was to take the burden off of the backs of the toiling masses. It put all the farming implements and bagging and ties on the free list. It placed the high duties upon luxuries and the comforts of life and low duties upon the necessities of life.

FEDERAL RESERVE CURRENCY.

The second great piece of constructive legislation by the Congress after Wilson's election was the Federal reserve or asset currency act. This act has enabled America to weather the storm and stress of the frequent pressure of the money power, and placed the small banks, the small merchant, and the farmer beyond the control of Wall Street. The Government can now prevent a panic being brought about by stock gamblers and speculators for their own private gain. If this law is wisely, justly, and fairly administered it is destined to be a great boon to all legitimate business and to prevent the farmer from being the victim of the speculator.

RURAL-CREDIT SYSTEM.

The farm-loan or rural-credit system is a great companion piece of legislation to the asset currency bill. The first is a boon to all the people. The second is a boon to the small farmer who is in debt and desires to pay for a small farm. In working for the passage of this bill I felt that I was performing a sacred duty to my own people as well as to all the people of America. When the farm prospers, we all prosper. The farmer is the first line of defense, not only in peace but also in war. This war is going to be won primarily by the American farmer. [Applause.]

FEDERAL AID TO GOOD ROADS.

The companion to the farm-loan bill is the good-roads bill. This bill commits the Federal Government to the proposition and is destined in the near future to cause farm life to be happier and more prosperous than ever before. Uncle Sam has put his hand to the good-roads plow and he will not turn back. [Applause.]

INCOME TAX.

Another great piece of Democratic legislation is the income-tax law. It is just and fair. It places the burden upon those best able to bear the burden of Government, upon those who get the most protection from the Government, upon those who but for Government could not own and possess such income-producing property. I believe that in this war we should tax the big incomes more heavily than we now do. [Applause.] I have always voted for heavy income taxes and will continue to do so.

PANAMA TOLLS.

The repeal of the Panama free tolls to the wicked coastwise monopoly—monopoly owned by the transcontinental railroads, the Standard Oil Co., United Fruit Co., and Lumber Trust. This law was passed during President Taft's administration. I voted against the law then, and when President Wilson came before Congress in person and asked Congress to repeal the law and to tax the monopoly-owned ships, just as all other ships were taxed, to use the Canal, I voted for the repeal of the law and to tax these monopoly-owned ships.

MARINE-INSURANCE BILL.

This bill was passed to prevent the insurance companies of the United States and England from robbing us on insurance after the breaking out of the European war. Instantly upon the passage of this act insurance on a bale of cotton dropped from $7.50 a bale to about 85 cents a bale, and saved millions of dollars on wheat and other American cargoes.

Mr. Chairman, there were other important measures which I could enumerate if my time permitted, but I want before I conclude to call your attention to the accomplishments of the present Congress, which will be known in history as the war Congress.

DECLARATION OF WAR.

The declaration of war resolution was a momentous step, not only in our own history but in the history of the world. This was not an offensive but a defensive resolution. Our right to sail the sea had been invaded, our citizens murdered. To be driven from the sea meant that our independence and right as a nation were destroyed. Our farmers would be unable to sell their products at an advantage, our manufacturers would suffer, and the prosperity of all the people would be destroyed. But, Mr. Chairman, it is too late to discuss the question of whether we should or should not have gotten into this war. We are in it and we must win. We will win. [Applause.]

SELECTIVE DRAFT.

After the declaration of war the next step was to get an army. We could not fight without an army. I did not vote for the selective draft. I did not think that conscription was the best way to raise an army. When at home I went upon the stump in every county in my district and discussed this whole question with my own people frankly. They had a right to know and I told them my reasons for so voting. But, Mr. Chairman, I urged upon the people of my district on every stump to stand by the selective draft, as it was our only means of raising an army. When the majority of Congress decided this issue against the report of our Democratic committee and passed the selective-draft law, I got behind it and helped to make it a success. I was a member of the Subcommittee on Deficiencies which made up the appropriations bill which gave to the Army the funds necessary to put into operation the selective-draft law and to make it a success; and all the Members of the House, without an exception, according to my recollection, voted for the bill which we presented to put that law into operation. Up to that time this was the greatest appropriation of money ever voted at one time by a legislative body in the history of the entire world.

APPROPRIATIONS LAST CONGRESS.

Mr. Chairman, the money which organized our Army and Navy, which built the cantonments and aviation fields, and, in fact, every dollar that was appropriated for our national defense at the last session of Congress came from the Appropriations Committee and was made up by the subcommittee on deficiencies, of which I was a member. Again Congress, without a dissenting vote, so far as I recollect, sustained the Appropriations Committee, giving evidence of the fact that our committee had done its duty and that Congress stood squarely behind this war with every dollar needed. [Applause.]

Our boys are going to the front now, and we are all so thankful in our hearts that we did do our full duty to them by supplying them with all they needed. [Applause.] I want our boys to have the best guns, ammunition, food, clothing, and all other equipment necessary to make them superior to the Germans, and if my vote and influence can get it for them they shall have it. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask the committee to indulge me for a moment while I enumerate a few of the measures passed by this Congress at this session. I will not try to mention these in their order, either as to time or their importance.

THE WAR FINANCE CORPORATION ACT.

The War Finance Corporation act is one under which the Government, through certain officials working with the Treasury Department, with Mr. McAdoo as chairman, takes control of the issues of securities in this country and limits their output. So that with the Federal reserve act, the national-bank law, and this new law control and direction of capital by the Government is assured.

RAILROADS.

The act taking over the railroads for the period of the war, as a war measure, assures the Government of every ounce of railroad transportation when needed for war purposes. This will enable the Government to prevent strikes and to keep the lines open for war activities.

EXPORT TRADE.

The act to promote export trade, which in effect vests the President with control of imports and exports of goods and merchandise. This power enables all ports and ships to be used to their maximum in handling war materials.

FARM LOAN.

Amendments to the farm-loan law which enables the Government to buy farm-loan bonds and thus stabilize these bonds. This was necessary to prevent the banks from strangling the farm loan to death.

MORATORIUM.

A law to prevent soldiers being proceeded against in court while in the service, so as to protect their civil rights until they can get back home.

SILVER.

An act to melt down silver money in the Treasury, so as to conserve the stock of gold, settle adverse foreign trade balances, establish better trade relations with silver-using countries, and stabilize our American dollar abroad.

SEDITION.

Several acts, all looking to punish seditious utterances against the United States, to tighten the espionage law, and to aid in putting down all pro-German propaganda in this country.

ALIEN PROPERTY.

An act to authorize the Alien Property Custodian to take charge of all property in this country owned by alien enemies, to operate all factories, and so forth, so that our enemies can not get any profit out of these plants. Also to protect the property of all foreigners, which will prevent differences between our Government and the allied Governments.

OVERMAN BILL.

The Overman bill gives the President the right to abolish any useless office, to consolidate departments, to discharge employees, and to abolish any department entirely if he thinks wise and best.

PORT CONTROL.

An act to exercise control over the departure and entrance of persons to and from the United States, thus with the port-control act giving the President control of persons and property coming into and going out of our ports. In this way the ports are opened and closed as the best interests of America may demand.

HOUSING BILL.

The bill giving over $100,000,000 to help house the war workers at and near the war-working plants where they could not get shelter. This was, as the President urged, essential to efficiency in getting out war material.

WAR AGAINST AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

The resolution declaring war on Austria-Hungary, which was making war on us along with Germany, so that in a lawful way we could extend our military activities and aggressions against that nation because it was waging war against us for its ally, Germany.

BOND BILL.

A bond law, giving authority to the Secretary of the Treasury, when needed, to issue twelve billions of bonds.

EMERGENCY SHIPPING CORPORATION.

A law authorizing the Emergency Shipping Corporation to take over and operate all transportation lines and facilities in the vicinity of all shipyards, such as street railroads, belt lines, all tugs, and other means at hand.

AMENDING THE DRAFT ACT.

An amendment to have all young men register for the selective draft when they reach 21 years of age and giving the President authority to draw upon the man power of the land for military duty.

WAR INSURANCE.

An act to insure soldiers and sailors for the benefit of themselves or those dependent upon them, and also an amendment of the original act broadening the plan of taking care of the wounded soldiers and the families of those who give up their lives for their country.

THE REHABILITATION OF WOUNDED SOLDIERS.

This is an act to establish schools to teach and train our crippled and blind soldiers to become self-supporting. Great work is being done in Canada along this line. Their boys come back crippled and hopeless, but after being trained and educated along proper lines they become useful and prosperous citizens.

INCREASED PAY OF SOLDIERS.

This act increased the pay of soldiers from $15 per month to $30 a month, with 20 per cent increase when abroad. In addition to this, we provided for allotments to be made from the soldier's pay to those dependent upon him; and the Government supplements that with a like amount. This is a godsend to many widows, wives, and mothers of soldier boys who had to leave them and go to war.

Mr. Chairman, these are some of the accomplishments of this war Congress. Many other acts just as important as the ones I have mentioned have been passed. As to what we did in the last session, I can not express it half as well as did the President of the United States:

OCTOBER 6, 1917.

The Sixty-fifth Congress, now adjourning, deserves the gratitude and appreciation of a people whose will and purpose, I believe, it has faithfully expressed. One can not examine the record of its action without being impressed by its completeness, its courage, and its full comprehension of a great task. The needs of the Army and Navy have been met in a way that assures the effectiveness of American arms, and the war-making branch of the Government has been abundantly equipped with the powers that were necessary to make the action of the Nation effective.

I believe that it has also in equal degree, and as far as possible in the face of war, safeguarded the rights of the people and kept in mind the considerations of social justice so often obscured in the hasty readjustments of such a crisis.

It seems to me that the work of this remarkable session has not only been done thoroughly, but that it has also been done with the utmost dispatch possible in the circumstances or consistent with a full consideration of the exceedingly critical matters dealt with. Best of all, it has left no doubt as to the spirit and determination of the country, but has affirmed them as loyally and as emphatically as our fine soldiers will affirm them on the firing line.

WOODROW WILSON.

This indorsement of what Congress did in the last session is complete. I was a member of the subcommittee that supplied the "needs of the Army and Navy * * *" in a way that assures the effectiveness of American arms."

So, gentlemen, when we look over the accomplishments of this Congress since the declaration of war, there have been, as I count them, over 100 distinct war measures which have passed up to about a week or 10 days ago, every one of which received my vote and support except one—conscription. If you will go through the RECORD and find just exactly how many pieces of distinct legislation have passed Congress, you will be amazed. And whatever criticism the country may make of the conduct of the war, in my judgment no just criticism can be fairly launched against the legislative branch of the Government, because we have given money in amounts that stagger the imagination. We have given to the President of the United States powers never dreamed of, and only justified by the war, for we would never dream of giving so much power in a Republic like this to any one man unless we believed it a war necessity.

Therefore all of this vast power that we have given to the President and to the administration means that great responsibilities rest upon the administration. Mistakes have been made—yes, many mistakes—but they are mistakes which are natural when we take into consideration the enormous amount of work that had to be done. The other day I was down in one of the great plants where they are testing the powder and the mobile artillery, and the amount of work done there within a few months is remarkable. It shows the ability of the American people to organize and to systematize their business along any lines that they desire, and is a great testimonial to American efficiency.

We have not been a warlike people. The people of America, as a rule, love peace. There were many people who were anxious to drive us early into the war. There were militarists who desired to put us into the war at an earlier time, and many people were impatient and did not believe that America would be able to cut much of a figure in the war. But since America got into the war the people have never stopped to ask the reason why. [Applause.]

In fact, when I have gone before my people at home I have always stated to them that while I voted for the war resolution I was unwilling to get into a controversy with any man as to whether we ought or ought not to have entered the war. I have declined to discuss that with anyone. I can justify in my own mind and heart my own vote, but to my mind it is not a material issue now as to why we got into the war. It is not a material issue as to whether we ought to have got into the war. That can be discussed after it is over. [Applause.] What is material to every patriot now is that we are in the war, and that America shall win it. That is the feeling of every American heart to-day. [Applause.] A friend of mine might caution me not to go too near the brink of the rapids at Niagara. He might properly tell me not to go too near the edge; but if I should fall in and am being carried rapidly toward the whirlpool the man is no friend of mine who stands on the bank and begins an argument with me and says: "Sisson, you ought not to have fallen into the rapids. I urged you not to go near the rapids." If he is a friend of mine, he will grab a rope or a pole and help me to get back to shore. Then he can argue with me as much as he pleases. So it is too late now for any man in America to begin to complain about our having gotten into the war. The fact is that we are in it; and being in it, it is the duty of every American citizen to do all in his power to win the war. So far as the people as a whole are concerned, in my judgment there has never been a people who have given more loyal support to any war than the people of America. [Applause.] I do not believe that the population of Germany were as nearly a unit at any time as the American people are to-day a unit. I believe that we are to be congratulated that, in spite of all adverse propaganda, the American spirit, the American love of country, the American devotion to principles of liberty, have been such that no propaganda has caused any delay in our war preparations or any sort of difficulty in raising and organizing an army.

Within the last few weeks we have demonstrated to the world that we are not only doing what we said we would do but we are doing infinitely more than we said we would do, because nobody contemplated that we would be able to get a million men into Europe before the 1st of January next. But, according to the statements of the press, according to the information given out by Gen. March, by the 1st of July, or certainly not later than the 15th of July, we will have more than a million fighting men in France, something that no man dreamed could be accomplished in so short a time.

The committee of which I am a member has stood squarely by every demand of our Army and Navy, and some time ago the press was restless and critics were harsh, but now, when we see the proud line of march of a million men, fully armed and equipped, on the battle fields of France, fighting victoriously for liberty and freedom and for home and fireside, our American hearts are filled with pride. Liberty-loving people of all lands hail our struggle with the wicked Hun with joy and hope for the future.

If the shipping facilities had been what we could have wished, capable of carrying the men as fast as we prepared them, and could have carried all the munitions as they are being now manufactured, we would be infinitely ahead of the program outlined eight or nine months ago.

I believe it has been due to the fact that the Congress of the United States has for the time being put aside politics, laid aside all questions of criticism, and, as a united people, we have been a united Congress in our devotion to duty and to the performance of that duty.

If we can within the next few months carry out the policy that has been adopted by the War and Navy Departments, we will have so far outstripped what we expected to do that in my judgment the tide of battle will have turned. [Applause.]

It is with pleasure that I read in the newspapers that there seems to be a change in the tide of affairs. When the time shall come and we gain the victory, as we must, my hope, my desire, my prayer is that when peace does come it will be a lasting peace. I do not believe that we can afford now since the war is on to have other than a complete victory. [Applause.] This victory ought to be one which will be lasting, and if it is true that we are to have a lasting victory with peace this great conflict on the European soil, the screeching shells, the groans of the dying, the terrible maelstrom, and that hellish groan that we hear from the European battle fields, may be the last dying agony of the war god; the war god that has caused the human family to shed in the past so many tears and has drenched the whole earth with blood; the war god that has levied such a toll on the human family, that has sent abroad so much hatred, so much agony, so much heartache—if it is his dying groan, if this is his last mighty dying struggle, as costly as war is in men and treasure, it will not be too costly if it means the death of the war god. If we can have a court of nations where men can settle disputes without going to unholy war, then we will have fulfilled the prophecy of the Prince of Peace that the day will come when men shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks and men shall go to war no more. If that hour shall come, it will be a consummation devoutly to be wished by all good hearts and will be the answer to the prayers of good men in every age of the world's history. If we can have that peace, we may devote in the future all the treasures that have heretofore been devoted to war to building up our internal affairs on all the continents by all governments of the world. We can have a universally educated and a universally prosperous people, because if you calculate to-day the vast sums of money that have been sacrificed and to be sacrificed, if we could devote that during the next century to upbuilding peaceable pursuits, we could revolutionize the whole world.

Now, since our hand is at the plow let us not turn back. We will not turn back until we have gained a complete and a lasting victory. [Applause.] If we can do that, then this Congress, looked upon now as a war Congress, will, as the days roll on, be looked on as that Congress which gave its support to these great measures and will be known as the great peace Congress of America and the great peace Congress of the world. [Applause.] Because these things will be historic, it is going to be a historical Congress in spite of what anyone may say, or whether you desire it or not. You are a part of the history of the world and a great part of it. Therefore forty centuries from now they will look back on this hour, they will look back on this day, they will look back on this as being the great American war Congress which came to the rescue of suffering, dying liberty in the world and saved the right of men to be free, saved the right of men to work out their own destinies in accordance with their own wish and will, so they do not interfere with the rights of others, and will secure that principle of international law that every people, whether great or small, have the right to exist, have the right to be free, the right to work out their own destinies in accordance with the privileges and abilities God has given them. [Applause.]

This is the mission that America has on earth. We will perform it, and perform it well. If we do, we will be instrumental in erecting not only on the American continent but on all of the continents and isles of the sea magnificent temples in which will dwell forever peace, love, unity, happiness, liberty, prosperity, and from the domes of these edifices will float flags; and whether it be the flag of our own Nation—the beautiful Stars and Stripes—or the flag of any other nation, each of these flags will stand for liberty, for equality, for justice. That is the aim, the object, and the purpose of all good men now engaged in this great struggle, and may the God of our fathers grant to our armies victory, because it is an unselfish victory; it is not a victory of conquest; it is not a victory for gold; it is not a victory for aggrandizement of an individual or aggrandizement of a nation, but is for the happiness, for the peace and for the good of the entire world. And if that is the spirit which inhabits the hearts of America, it will receive the blessing of an all-wise and a just and a peace-loving God. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I was interested in various phases of the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi, a member of the Appropriations Committee. Loyalty to his committee prompted him to refer to it as "the leading committee of the House." It was written of the shoemaker, saying, "There is nothing like leather." In other words, that which is ours is the best. That to which we belong is supreme. If he, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, had made one exception, I should have entirely approved of his encomium. We members of the Ways and Means Committee, of course, challenge his claim to primacy.

As the husbandman must gather that which keeps the household going, so the Committee on Ways and Means has the burden of collecting the coin of the Nation, and all the Appropriations Committee has to do is to spend it. Of their spending I am not and have not been a drastic critic, especially during this period of the great war when money representing our hitherto converted energies as well as our appropriated credit means so much in mobilizing, arming, transporting, and maintaining our land and naval forces in the great world conflict, of which they promise well to become the determining factor in the achievement of triumphant victory.

FORTIFICATIONS BILL.

The fortifications bill now under consideration is remarkable in that it carries the colossal sum of $5,500,000,000 for defense and potential offense. Viewed as a defensive measure, it is not only the largest ever made by the Republic prior to the present war, but it is a larger appropriation for this purpose than was ever made by any Nation for any year in all recorded time. This is in harmony with the large affairs of the times, when we talk of billions instead of millions, sometimes even using trillions to express values. The world is speaking now of races instead of peoples and continents instead of countries.

If the large appropriation we now contemplate making to resist invasion in this or any future period is significant in magnitude, it is also magnificent in significance. It is the concrete expression of that thought which was in the minds of many millions 16 months ago concerning America's defense. For in this war as in all others consideration of defense is the first prompting of patriotism. The relation of the appropriation, which I heartily approve, as to our manner of entry into the great war, is of historical and momentous interest.

FUTURE REVIEW OF WAR DEVELOPMENT.

Some day when this war shall have been closed in victory a philosophic discussion can be had of the evolution and development of the war movement in America. Such discussion, while accepting April 6, 1917, as the focal date, will adopt a considerable range of years preceding that date in which will be considered many subjects bearing upon the ultimate entry into the war. Much will be said and with propriety of the well-organized drift in European affairs toward a world conflict or a world peace. Attention will be called to the efforts of the world leaders to secure a system of settlement of international controversies, the most concrete and hopeful for success being that conducted by ex-President Taft, which so nearly reached consummation in the final months of his administration.

Much will be said of the beginning and progress of the European war prior to our entry. The unavoidable friction which, in the judgment of a large number of statesmen, could culminate in nothing but a clash will be freely commented upon. The course of those in power in preparing or failing to prepare for that which nearly all now admit to have been unavoidable will be a subject of considerable criticism, and I might venture to say few there are who will, with one Creel, render thanks on account of our being unprepared.

When the ruthless submarine policy was announced by Germany to take effect the 1st of February and sinkings had occurred, the President of the United States came before Congress asking authority to arm American ships that they might resist submarine attacks. This was what a great many Americans desired and only in default of which consideration the McLemore resolution, or any part of it, was tolerated.

The first section of the armed-neutrality resolution was as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to supply merchant ships, the property of citizens of the United States and bearing American registry, with defensive arms and also with the necessary ammunition and means of making use of them in defense against unlawful attack; and that he be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to protect such ships and the citizens of the United States against unlawful attack while in their lawful and peaceful pursuits on the high seas.

It will be noted that the foregoing was a distinctively defensive measure. In the President's message to Congress in support of the above resolution, delivered on February 26, 1917, I find the two following important passages:

No one doubts what it is our duty to do. We must defend our commerce and the lives of our people in the midst of the present trying circumstances with discretion, but with clear and steadfast purpose. Only the method and the extent remain to be chosen upon the occasion, if occasion should, indeed, arise.

* * * * * * *

I am not now proposing or contemplating war or any steps that need lead to it.

For this measure I voted, as did the membership of the House, with 14 exceptions. So that when this House by almost unanimous vote on the 1st day of March, 1917, in response to the Executive's request, granted it war was not contemplated, although Germany, by the announcement of her submarine policy beginning February 1, had created a state of war.

PREWAR CHRONOLOGY.

The following chronology is interesting:

The above speech was delivered by the President on February 26, 1917. March 1, neutrality resolution was passed by the House of Representatives. March 4, resolution defeated in Senate by extended discussion and expiration of the Sixty-fourth Congress. March 9, first call of President for extra session to convene on April 16. March 21, second call for extra session on April 2.

The Sixty-fifth Congress will be known in history as a war Congress. It was called as an extraordinary session to meet on April 2, 1917, for the purpose of declaring the existence of a state of war with Germany. The first task of the new Congress was to determine what form of declaration should be made as to the existence of a state of war and its subsequent prosecution.

WAR DECLARATION.

The form of declaration would be of extraordinary interest in any event, but as related to this important measure is of transcendant interest. A form of war declaration was prepared in the executive department of the Government and simultaneously introduced in the Senate and House, being referred to the Foreign Affairs Committee in the House and the Foreign Relations Committee in the Senate. That declaration was in the following form:

EXECUTIVE FORM.

Resolved, etc., That the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government, which has thus been thrust upon the United States, is hereby formally declared, and that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to take immediate steps not only to put the country in a thorough state of defense but also to exert all of its power and employ all of its resources to carry on the war against the Imperial German Government and to bring the conflict to a successful termination.

The Senate committee cut out the proposition for placing the country in a state of defense and broadened the means of carrying on the war by a pledge of the resources of the country.

AMENDED FORM OF DECLARATION.

In this form the resolution passed, being as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government, which has thus been thrust upon the United States, is hereby formally declared, and the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial German Government, and to bring the conflict to a successful termination all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States.

On the 5th of April, near the closing hours of the debate, I presented to the Committee of the Whole House and had a vote taken there on the following declaration in the nature of a substitute:

SLOAN SUBSTITUTE.

Resolved, etc., That the said state of war between the United States and certain citizens on one hand and the Imperial German Government, brought about by the Imperial German Government, is hereby formally declared, and that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to take immediate steps to place the country in a thorough state of defense and enforce American rights both as to citizens and ships on land and on the high seas and especially within the zones where said rights have been interfered with and to that end the President is authorized to use the military and naval forces of the United States, together with all the immediate available resources of the Government.

There was a considerable vote in favor of this resolution, but being taken in the Committee of the Whole the individual vote record could not be preserved. It may be stated that this was the only war declaration prepared, presented, and a vote caused to be taken thereon by any Member of House or Senate.

The first important difference, it will be observed, between my resolution and the one that passed was that mine provided for placing the country in a state of thorough defense. Other differences I do not comment upon, nor shall I hereafter unless they should be changed or be in a process of modification as is going on now with reference to the defense proposition. Because I am one of those who believe that what our constitutional authorities do with reference to foreign nations in or concerning war is right, I do not admit the contingencies and alternatives of Decatur. I would paraphrase his famous statement by saying, "My country, in her relations with other countries, is always right; therefore my country." [Applause.] But for all this I can not overlook the fact that as to the great element of defensive preparation, after the lapse of 15 months, the right as my country now sees it is the right as I saw it then.

LACK OF PREPAREDNESS.

This large defensive measure, which, of course, includes large potential offensive means, brings forcibly to our minds America's strange course in lack of preparation, both in discipline of man power and the culpable neglect of those in authority to prepare munitions of war and construct both mobile and stationary elements of defense commensurate with what has been at stake and the growing menace, which to say "could not have been foreseen" would be to deny ordinary intelligence to those responsible, and to admit their recognition without following with adequate action would constitute a more serious charge.

Coming from that part of the country supposed to have been less concerned as to possible international difficulties, I recall with some comfort my entire course in and out of Congress standing for large means of preparedness, although in three campaigns I met emphatic criticism for my views so expressed or votes delivered. Yet from no part of the great interior have I heard of anyone thanking the Lord for our lack of preparation at the beginning of this world war. That was reserved for a man in our National Capital in and continuing in a position of responsibility, and so far as the public knows wholly unrebuked.

NAVAL PROGRAM SPEECH.

On the night of March 3, 1913, in the closing hours of the Sixty-second Congress, and within a few hours of an incoming administration which has controlled national affairs since that time, the deadlock in conference between a Democratic House and a Republican Senate on a navy policy represented in the question of "one or two battleships" was broken in favor of the House contention for one battleship. Congressman Foss, Republican ranking member of the Naval Affairs Committee, granted me some time to address the House opposing the conference agreement. On that occasion I spoke as follows:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, at this late hour I should not have trespassed upon the time of this House to favor two battleships if, in the various debates concerning this question, the reason for my vote had been given. The controlling consideration of whether we should have two battleships or one is not dollars and cents. It is a question of whether or not the ruling power of this country or that which will be the ruling power of this Government to-morrow shall live up to the responsibility it has assumed. I, in common with perhaps every man on the floor of this House, would be pleased to see the necessity for battleships absolutely removed. The hammers and forges of the world, busy in the construction of battleships, know no sunrise, sunset, or midnight. It is a sound of preparation in every quarter of the globe. It was thought that America would and could take the lead in disarmament. The President of the United States, whose term expires to-morrow, negotiated treaties with the great powers of the earth looking toward this precise end; that is, the removal of the necessity for the construction of battleships. The treaty-ratifying power is at the other end of this Capitol Building, and as that body was constituted during the last year neither party was in control, because it took two-thirds to adopt or ratify a treaty.

Those treaties, which if put into effect by the Senate of the United States would have given the other side of this House an excuse for opposing the construction of battleships, were emasculated and their effectiveness absolutely averted and destroyed, and the other high contracting powers would not agree to the emasculated agreement. These amendments were not made by the votes of those who supported the President of the United States, but by the votes of the side of the House which upon to-morrow will assume control of the affairs of this Government.

Two important amendments were used for the purpose of defeating those treaties. One was known as the Bacon amendment. The amendment is as follows:

"Provided, That the Senate advises and consents to the ratification of the said treaty with the understanding, to be made a part of such ratification, that the treaty does not authorize the submission to arbitration of any question which affects the admission of aliens into the United States, or the admission of aliens to the educational institutions of the several States, or the territorial integrity of the several States or of the United States, or concerning the question of the alleged indebtedness or moneyed obligations of any State of the United States, or any question which depends upon or involves the maintenance of the traditional attitude of the United States concerning American questions, commonly described as the Monroe doctrine, or other purely governmental policy."

For the Bacon amendment 7 Republicans voted and 39 Democrats, while 36 Republicans and no Democrats voted against the Bacon amendment. The committee amendment, which proposed to strike out the third paragraph of article 3, is as follows:

"It is further agreed, however, that in cases in which the parties disagree as to whether or not a difference is subject to arbitration under article 1 of this treaty, that question shall be submitted to the joint high commission of inquiry; and if all or all but one of the members of the commission agree and report that such difference is within the scope of article 1, it shall be referred to arbitration in accordance with the provision of this treaty"—

For this amendment, 36 Democrats and 6 Republicans; against the amendment, 3 Democrats and 37 Republicans. So that from the members of the party which to-morrow will assume the control of the affairs of this Government, when the President of the United States said, "We desire to remove the necessity for the construction of battleships by entering into treaties of peace with the great battleship-making powers of the earth," came the vote that emasculated those treaties and prevented their effective adoption. It came as a challenge to the world—"We are ready to fight." You gave the "defi" to the battleship countries of the world, and you would better not bluff. You would better prepare to make good.

This is the reason why I vote for two battleships and because we, through your action, gave the "defi." If we have not a substantial Navy when that "defi" is accepted, by whatever power on earth sees fit to accept it, then our Navy will be passed, our shores will be reached, and our battles must be fought by our young men, the volunteer soldiery of the United States; and when foreign enemies approach us, however superior we may be, our loss in land battles will be great. If our battles be fought on the sea it will be largely by the professional warriors; the result will be swift and decisive; while if we fight on land fighting will be done by our sons drawn from our homes. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, you will find that battleships are cheaper than boys. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

A very satisfactory answer to that discussion is found in the naval bill, which recently passed this House, carrying appropriations and authorizations in the sum of $1,300,000,000. We will not at this time speculate as to whether the submarine policy of Germany would have ever been inaugurated if the American Navy had been, 18 months ago, of the proper proportions.

NEBRASKA SENTIMENT.

A recent extended visit to Nebraska, where I traveled over twenty-five hundred miles and delivered some 28 speeches on Red Cross, Grand Army of the Republic Encampment, commencement, Memorial, and flag-raising occasions, enabled me to meet many thousands of people, of various frame and angle, up to April 6, 1917. Like all other true Americans, Nebraskans accepted the judgment of the American Congress when it declared the existence of a state of war, and have since that time adjusted their former sentiments and prejudices, if they had any differing ones, to the demands of the Nation, and are giving their sons and their substance, time, and talents to reinforce the national will and might in the colossal struggle which for us is a fight to a finish and a war to be won. [Applause.]

These people neither fold their hands nor close their minds. They are ready for any task and they will meet every mental test. While they are cheerfullly paying and ungrudgingly giving, they want to know and they would better be told. They are interested in the men who are being called to battle, their care, equipment, and burdens. It would be well to fully advise them of the disposition of the taxes they pay, the money they invest, and coin they give. They desire to know that every dollar expended brings a dollar of value. They would be better satisfied if critical eyes should scan and critical judgments approve our large expenditures. They would be much better satisfied if those in authority had carried out their agreement of a year ago to have a bipartisan committee on war expenditures. They are convinced that had such a committee been organized early last fall our aeroplane program would not have had its lamentable shortcoming. To the folks who paid or invested their money which Congress set aside to the extent of about a billion dollars for aviation in several bills there was but one satisfactory answer—aeroplanes. There is but one answer—aeroplanes. There will be but one answer tolerated—aeroplanes, and aeroplanes in time. Investigations are interesting, but the aeroplanes are vital.

In this war the day of the academician is over. The palavering theorist is expected to be still. The pandering pacifist who prevented preparedness should hold his tongue and work and fight until the war is over as a penance for his misdeeds.

Nebraskans do not desire to be coddled or lulled. Neither are they hypercritical. They will overlook much. But they insist on knowing the precise conditions. Perhaps one of the best services performed for our people and soldiers was by Congressmen MILLER of Minnesota and MCCORMICK of Illinois, who visited the battle fronts, observed real conditions, and, returning, placed the information where it was heeded. Following this, rifle production, ordnance manufacture, and aeroplane construction were speeded up.

PATRIOTISM AND PARTISANSHIP.

To win the war as it should be won, with terms of peace dictated by America's righteous judgment, accepted by the allies, and approved by the conscience of mankind, is the prime purpose of our people. But to do this they see no occasion for neglecting their duties, their religion, or their patriotic partisanship. In fact, they treat all these as units of patriotism which should be developed to the highest efficiency. The party in power in Nebraska was never more politically active. The minority party is not idle, nor will its members be imposed upon by that fine piece of grim humor which was flashed across the country a few weeks ago saying "politics is adjourned."

Nebraska Republicans will not consent to their party being either assimilated or taken over as a war measure and placed in the common depository with the railroads, the reserve and land banks, and the war-risk insurance.

REPUBLICAN PARTY.

The Republican Party came into being to meet the great problems of the Republic nearly three-quarters of a century ago. Its principles were tested and crystallized in battle for the Republic's existence in a war which waited more than 60 years for an equal. Through its principles of equality before the law, equal opportunity for life's comforts, development of national resources, sound finance, national integrity, and international standing, with a policy of protection for both industry and citizens, it accomplished reconstruction and brought the Republic to supremacy in wealth and primacy in diplomacy among the nations.

The Republican Party represents a majority of the voting population of the United States. Its followers pay two-thirds of the taxes of the country. Its Representatives and Senators stood for preparedness against Democratic opposition from all sources and departments of Government before the war. When it surrendered power it left an overflowing Treasury, which abundance in the years preceding our declaration of war, while national defense and military preparation were neglected, was turned into a deficit, and we found ourselves issuing bonds in time of peace for the running expenses of the Government.

With this record and reputation safe in its history and secure in its present patriotic position, the Republican Party has and should have full confidence in its own future. It should especially resent any attempt of benevolent assimilation by those who have been its traditional enemies. It should by no means listen to the soft, sibilant suggestions of those within its own ranks who would aspire to carry its banners over to its old-time adversaries.

COUNTRY NEEDS THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

The country needs the Republican party in control of legislation. The fact that the end of the fiscal year of 1918 has come and practically all of the great supply bills which should have been enacted into law before that date lie strewn in ditch and bog somewhere along the ill-kept highway of national legislation is a trumpet call for Republican return to power.

The Republican Party should be placed in control of legislation, because we are importing nearly $3,000,000,000 worth of goods from foreign lands made by foreign labor. That is the greatest amount of imports in the history of the country. At the same time we are collecting less duties at the ports than we have in our history since 1898, the last fiscal year affected by the Wilson tariff law. That amount is little more than half what so-called free-trade England is now collecting at her ports.

We are collecting our taxes in the North and spending them largely in the South, which the party in power favors and for which the Republican Party should not stand.

We are spending more money than ever in our history or in the history of any country in all recorded time, and yet that part of the people who pay the largest portion of them are denied any part in the oversight of their expenditures.

BIPARTISAN COMMITTEE.

Formation of a bipartisan committee, which was last year agreed to by the leaders of Congress, was defeated in a manner well known to the public. It is well recognized that if there had been more bipartisan oversight, there would have been less necessity for departmental or legislative investigation.

GRANTS OF POWER.

This Congress, in its patriotic endeavor to render efficient all war functions and activities, made tremendous grants of power to the executive branch of the Government. These grants are being exercised by the appointees of the party in power. It would be but human that that party under which such grants were made would find itself unable to restore those rights and prerogatives to the people and the Congress to whom they originally belonged. The Republican Party will be in position, and it should have that stability of purpose and strength of fiber when the war shall have been closed to make that constitutional restoration.

PARTY AND LEADERSHIP UNITED.

The Republican Party, reunited in its leadership, united in its following, will, in my opinion, exert all its efficiency and all its power in bringing the war to a triumphant conclusion. It will also present a sound organization, ready and capable to take over the control of this Government and successfully solve the economic, legislative, and diplomatic problems which will crowd for consideration when the end comes.

VINDICATION.

It is often somewhat trying to espouse some sound principle or oppose an unsound one and find a majority against you with convictions and prejudices as fixed as the laws of the Medes and Persians. It is, however, certainly gratifying to find time working change so fast that you become an unimportant factor of the majority, instead of being the whole minority. For instance, I have just read in the Washington papers that immediate work is to be begun on 48 great warships, for which provision is made in our recent naval program. It is of some comfort and satisfaction to recall the fight made over five years ago for an increase in our naval building in which I was supported by my colleague, Hon. M. P. KINKAID. Congressman REAVIS was not then a Member.

WAR AGAINST AUSTRIA.

When war was declared I called attention to the Austro-Hungarian monarchy as made up of many oppressed people, who would be more liable to rise in revolt against their rulers than would the Germans who, with blind fatuity and a devotion worthy a vastly better cause, support their oppressive government and its wicked conscienceless ruler. With the lapse of eight months after war was declared there was a declaration made against Austria-Hungary, and distinct progress is being made toward the defeat and downfall of the Hapsburg dynasty.

CONVERTIBLE BOND POLICY.

At the beginning of financial operations for the war it was urged by those in authority that the only way to float our bonds was to begin and carry out an elaborate system of convertible issues. So that every bond issue of an earlier date would, at the option of the holder, be convertible into a later issue at the higher rate of interest which the later issue was expected to bear. It was said that Britain had adopted this elaborate system for financing the war. I called attention to the fact that Britain had tried it once and then abandoned it. It did not seem to impress those who should have considered it that if our policy of keeping our securities at par the state of the United States bond market at or about the time for a new issue would dictate the rate of interest the proposed issue would bear. This left it open for a few bond speculators in advance of the new issue to depress the market price, force the increase of interest, and then compel the Treasury to reissue in exchange for the new issue at a higher rate all the former low-rate issues.

It is a matter for congratulation that in the recent issue the right of convertibility was cut out, and the bonds were oversold. And now comes the announcement for the next which is to be the largest issue of all, to wit, six billion, there is to be no increased interest rate. This reversal of policy will save during the life of the nonconverting bonds billions of dollars in interest.

It is interesting now to see the tables that are being issued by the Treasury Department showing the expense of converting the convertible bonds. It depends somewhat, of course, on what may be presented for conversion, yet if the right of convertibility were to be exercised to the extent of opportunity already allowed, it would mean an additional interest stretching over the life of the various bond issues, amounting to more than a billion dollars in interest payment by the Treasury.

TAX AND BOND POLICY.

One of the policies that should be adhered to in financing the war, and which I at an early date advocated on the floor of the House, is the payment of as large a portion as possible of our war expenses and, of course, borrowing as little as necessary. There are four important reasons for this policy:

First. Large bond issues tend to create great inflation, which is disastrous to wholesome business.

Second. Bonds sell better if the authority issuing them show a habit and practice of payment rather than constant deferring of payment.

Third. A dollar paid now instead of a dollar obligated to be paid at a future date will take the place of a dollar and a half at that time measured in average values as a measure of contraction must exist when liquidation is going on.

Fourth. If our gallant men go to a foreign field or elsewhere to fight our battles, our toll and income should sustain them in so far as is reasonably possible, rather than making the cost of their maintenance a mortgage on their future to be paid in considerable part by them after their return. Many of these bonds will mature at about the time the returning soldiers will reach their highest earning power.

HOG CHOLERA AND TUBERCULOSIS.

Throughout the Northwest the two great economic sources of loss to the farmers and live-stock men have been hog cholera and tuberculosis. My first important work in Congress was to enlist the Federal Government in cooperation with the several States in the eradication of hog cholera.

Data computed by the Department of Agriculture show losses of $75,000,000 in 1914 from hog cholera and about $32,000,000 for the year ending March 31, 1918, whereas the proportion of hogs lost from disease decreased from 118 per thousand in 1913 to 42 per thousand in the year ending March 31, 1918. These figures show a reduction of over 56 per cent in money losses and nearly 66 per cent in the proportion of hogs lost.

Judging from the field reports of bureau inspectors, there has been a further reduction in the losses since the last estimate. The extension of hog-cholera work as a war measure, together with the increased activities of the Dairy Division and the Animal Husbandry Division, and the rigid enforcement of the regulations promulgated under the serum-virus act of 1913, are bringing results that no doubt will reflect favorably in producing the required 15 per cent increase in hog production in 1918. (Mohler.)

My second was to obtain similar action as to live-stock tuberculosis. An appropriation for this has just been made. I feel that the latter enterprise will succeed equally with the former from an economic standpoint, and in its indirect relation to serving human life and health will accomplish a great good toward reduction, and in the end practically eradication, of this civilization-old scourge of man and plague of beast.

NEBRASKA AGRICULTURAL POLICY.
